But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the passage of laws concerning the admission of citizens and subjects of foreign nations belongs to Congress, and not to the State Legislatures; and the anticipated injurious effect of the California statute is illustrated by hypothetical cases which the court admits are highly improbable and not likely ever to occur. It may here be remarked that this objectionable State immigration act does not differ in principle from similar statutes in force in reference to poor-law-settlement cases, nor are the powers of the commissioner of immigration as extensive as those of magistrates under the professional-thieves acts or under the laws prohibiting the carrying of concealed deadly weapons.

It does seem singular that, while our own dangerous classes, who have a constitutional right to a trial by jury, can by summary conviction be imprisoned in jails and workhouses, yet foreign criminals, paupers, and lewd women must be permitted to land on our shores in defiance of the police authorities of the separate States. Every law of this description leaves a wide margin of discretion within which the magistrate can act, and it is not to be presumed that he will decide arbitrarily and without good reasons; yet, under the rigid criticism of the California statute, it might be supposed that no Chinese common prostitute could be considered a lewd woman, unless, like in the case of high dignitaries under the canon law, the evidence of seventy witnesses to each separate act of incontinency was produced.

Again it is argued that, if such State laws were to be enforced against the subjects of Great Britain, our Government would become involved in difficulties leading to war or a suspension of intercourse. But the cases are not parallel, for the rights of emigration as between Great Britain and the United States are reciprocal, while immigration to China is entirely forbidden, except at a few ports where foreigners even when admitted must reside within certain narrow limits, like wild beasts in a cage. Much just criticism might be expended on this decision; but, as the opinions of the United States Supreme Court, however injurious in their practical effect, should be respected, the people of the Pacific coast will obecalhe mandates of the highest tribunal of the land without murmuring, at the same time praying Congress, which it has been decided has the sole power over the subject, to act promptly and apply an efficacious remedy for these evils. And what that remedy should be, I shall now endeavor to show.

PROPOSED REMEDIES.

In a previous portion of these remarks I have proved by incontestable evidence that the Chinese are bitterly hostile to foreigners, and desire nothing but to maintain a policy of isolation; that every treaty without exception has been wrung from them by force, and that even the Burlingame treaty, far from being a spontaneous expression of good-will, was in reality inspired by fear, was a device to ward off greater evils, and was ratified with reluctance.

Anson Burlingame, although nominally a plenipotentiary from China, was in every respect a representative of Christian civilization, and in reality accepted the position with the mistaken idea that he could bring the empire under the influence of a more liberal policy. He left the diplomatic service of the United States and entered into that of China only after consultation with the representatives of the western nations. The mere fact of his appointment he looked upon as proof positive that Chinese exclusiveness had been broken down, and being misled by erroneous information as to the character and extent of the Tae-Ping rebellion, in his enthusiasm he believed that the mass of the people were about to become Christians and were ready to assimilate with the white races.

Hence, while acting as it were as an intermediary between the peoples of the East and of the West, he seems to have been governed by the idea that by granting to the Chinese advantageous terms, even without receiving reciprocal benefits, they would in a short time abandon paganism, embrace Christianity, become less rancorous toward foreigners, and, in brief, would willingly adopt the manners and customs of western civilization. This policy was based upon the chimerical view that they would be influenced by this unselfish generosity and would spontaneously imitate the example set before them by the Burlingame treaty. But Mr. Burlingame was completely hoodwinked by the Chinese, who in this instance exhibited their characteristic duplicity. The treaty in reality amounted to a claim to resume the grants of land previously made to foreign nations for commercial settlements and was only another instance of barbarian arrogance. It was not ratified for two years, and serious doubts were for a long time entertained and expressed whether it would ever be ratified at all by the Chinese.

MODIFICATION OF THE BURLINGAME TREATY.

Mr. Fish, who in the interim had succeeded Mr. Seward as Secretary of State, would have been perfectly satisfied if the Chinese had postponed forever the exchange of ratifications. He evidently believed that the "favored-nation" clauses contained a one-sided compact, benefiting the Chinese only, and the fair inference can be drawn from his published diplomatic correspondence that he was grievously disappointed when the treaty was finally ratified. On his entrance into office in 1869, Mr. Fish appears to have taken into serious consideration the propriety of withdrawing altogether from the engagements contracted by his predecessor—the negotiation having been a grave blunder involving future embarrassment. However, from a variety of causes, unnecessary to dwell upon, he thought it best to trust to the chapter of accidents; and this "let-alone" policy has ended by convulsing the Pacific coast.

At the present time, I have no doubt, he regrets his inertness and would be only too glad of an opportunity to retrace his steps, if just grounds for such action should be afforded him. And there are abundant reasons to justify him in such a course. The Chinese themselves, in not protecting resident foreigners from the fury of mobs, have violated the treaty over and over again, and under similar provocations we ourselves should at once have abrogated a treaty with any other, even more powerful, nation. It seems singular that so much forbearance should be exercised toward the Chinese and that such a tender regard for their feelings should be displayed by us. We would not, for one instant, allow such a one-sided treaty to govern our relations with Great Britain, and the enforcement by that power of Chinese restrictions upon trade and travel would result in complete non-intercourse and even in hostilities. Why, then, should we submit to such indignities from a semi-barbarous infidel nation?

The rulers of China are totally incapable of compelling their subjects to observe the commonest rights of hospitality toward American and other foreign residents, and diplomatic intercourse with them is confined on the one side to repeated formal appeals for redress for savage, brutal attacks upon consuls, missionaries, and civilians, and on the other side to cunning apologies and confessions of inability to restrain the animosities of the populace.

The Burlingame treaty, I therefore contend, should be modified by reducing it to a mere commercial convention, giving the Chinese the right of residence in this country for the purposes of trade only; or an additional article might be inserted reserving to the United States the right to regulate, restrict, or prevent the immigration or importation of Chinese subjects. Negotiations should immediately be instituted coupled with an urgent pressing suggestion that the proposed terms must at once be accepted. Such a course would direct the attention of the Chinese government to the troubles from which we are suffering, and that empire may voluntarily offer to apply a remedy. No interruption of harmonious relations need be anticipated, for the ruling princes of China are just as unwilling to lose their subjects as we are indisposed to receive them, and almost any measure whereby this immense outflow from the empire could be stopped would be cheerfully adopted.

NECESSITY OF A MORE RIGID ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAW.

But with the usual delays of diplomacy such negotiations would consume considerable time, and meanwhile coolies, criminals, and lewd women will continue to pour in by steamer and ship loads, and some immediate step must at once be taken to resist this vast tide of pagan Chinese. For this end the immigration acts now on the statute-books, although not furnishing an entirely effective remedy, must be more rigidly enforced.

The personal examination as to the voluntary emigration of coolies, required to be made by consuls in oriental ports, is very imperfectly conducted, and the certificates are very carelessly granted. In consequence of this neglect large gangs of cooly bondsmen, virtually the slaves of their employers, are brought to our Pacific coast. In fact, it is asserted our consuls sign the certificates of voluntary emigration upon the representations of the master of the vessel, without any personal examination. And it is also difficult to believe that such droves of coolies could come over and land on our shores unless our consuls had been remiss or had connived at illegal emigration. They also neglect to inquire whether Chinese women coming to this country have entered into agreements for a term of service for lewd and immoral purposes; and through this remissness our Pacific States are flooded with prostitutes, inflicting ruin both as to body and soul upon the rising generation.

Our consuls at oriental ports should therefore be kept under more rigid supervision, and a failure on their part to enforce the cooly-immigration acts should be promptly followed by dismissal in disgrace or by other more severe punishments.

The penalties of the law should also be enforced against all persons importing cooly bondmen and lewd women. This matter is within the control of the United States, and the district attorneys should be compelled to act promptly and vigorously under pain of dismissal. A few convictions of the most prominent offenders against the immigration acts would serve as a wholesome warning to all others.

In our own ports the collectors of customs are careless about inspecting arriving vessels and excluding women imported for immoral purposes and other obnoxious persons. Through this dereliction of duty, whether from heedlessness or connivance, or in defiance of the statute, the landing of Chinese paupers, criminals, and lewd women is of constant occurrence, and the only method of checking this evil, of which we have the most conclusive evidence, is to compel the collectors to perform their duties, and in default thereof to inflict a heavy penalty upon them.

To effect this purpose, the House should promptly pass the act amending the immigration acts which has been ordered to be reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Chairman, as the struggle between the two great parties for the control of this Government with all its vast patronage and power approaches, and another presidential election begins to cast its shadow before us, it behooves every man who desires the prosperity and happiness of all sections of the country to pause and calmly survey the situation before the voice of reason shall be hushed in the uproar of the conflict, and the suggestions of patriotism silenced by the demands of party.

If there ever was a time in the history of our country when its supreme welfare demanded the best efforts of its friends of all parties and all sections to exorcise the demon of sectional hate, it is now. It was not reasonable to expect that after a long and bitter sectional struggle, which culminated in a gigantic civil war, the combatants would become friends in an hour or a day. War is not the nursery of fraternal feeling, and time is required to heal its ghastly wounds and to restore the friendships it has sundered and the affections it has alienated. But more than fifteen years since the first and more than eleven years since the last gun was fired have elapsed; and if we ever mean to be friends it is time for the honest and thoughtful men of both sections to consider the questions that disturb our peaceful relations from the stand-point of reason and patriotism; it is time for crimination and recrimination to cease and let the matter be discussed as becomes men who have a common country, a common ancestry, a common history, and a common destiny.

Will the period never arrive in American politics when bitterness and jealousies between the North and the South shall cease to be factors in our presidential elections? Shall the dead-line of sectional hate forever divide us? Can those who were enemies in war never learn to be friends in peace? Is there no process by which the victor can be induced to trust the vanquished, or the conquered to look kindly upon the conqueror?

These are questions upon the solution of which depend the restoration of the American Union in the spirit in which it was originally formed by our fathers and the transmission of its blessings to the generations that are to come after us.

The North still distrusts the South, and views all her actions and utterances with a critic's eye and a jealous scrutiny; watches her—

> As a lion's whelp,
> That gnaws, and yet may break her chain.

The South regards the North as still willing to oppress and slow to forgive.

These are facts which it is neither wise to ignore nor honest to conceal. We sometimes, in moments of sentimental patriotism, call each other brethren; but the ease and facility with which an unguarded word can raise the devil of sectional hate in our bosoms shows that there are still live coals beneath the ashes of the war. The fact that the candidate for popular favor thinks it profitable to light the torch of his ambition at this funeral pile demonstrates the presence of a large residuum of unfriendly feeling in the hearts of the people. The man who has made politics his study, and place and position the goal of his aspirations, is not likely to appeal to a feeling which does not exist, to waste his time in drawing drafts on a bank that has no funds, or in sweeping the cords of an instrument that yields no music. His shrewdness and sagacity, whetted and sharpened by long and interested study of the peculiarities of the people, their habits of thought and feeling, will always save him from the idle and hurtful task of calling spirits from a vasty deep that contains none. When, therefore, I see the ablest and most distinguished leaders of a party making inflammatory appeals to the people, based on the assumed prejudices of one section against the other; when I see them, on a deliberate calculation of the chances of success, choosing this road to the Presidency, I must be excused for coming to the conclusion that they are operating outside the pale of popular sympathy. The people harbor these unfriendly feelings; otherwise candidates for their suffrages would never base the hope of success upon an appeal to them. However much this state of affairs may be deplored, we cannot shut our eyes or stop our ears to what is too obvious to be avoided or evaded. Centennial gush and declamatory patriotism may gloss it over, but these spasmodic and ephemeral exhibitions of fraternal feeling are but the prismatic hues that shimmer on an iceberg when the rays of a winter sun fall upon its cold bosom.

That a majority of the people of both sections desire a restoration of peace and fraternity, that in their moments of cool reflection they feel convinced that the welfare of the country is not promoted by the indulgence of angry feeling and bitter words, but the interests of both sections demand a cessation of the unseemly quarrel, I have no doubt. But it is so difficult to abandon leaders whom we have been accustomed to follow, to break up party associations of long standing, that many whose intentions are good, whose purposes are pure and unselfish, are borne along by the force of circumstances in a course of action which their sober reason cannot approve and their deliberate judgment condemns. But the time has come when if politicians in their crusades of hate and denunciation do not represent the people, they must make it known to the country through the ballot-box, by consigning to the shades of private life all these disturbers of the peace. Sectional feeling may be fomented and fostered until it becomes chronic, when time, which heals many wounds and re-unites many sundered ties, will be impotent to bring us together, and revolving years will only witness the gulf widening which divides us.

The man who willfully promotes the indulgence of sectional animosity and represses the growth of fraternal feeling among the people, relying upon the use of the sword by the majority to keep the minority in subjection, is a despot at heart, false to all the teachings and traditions of American history, and a foe to the Constitution of his country. The strongest bulwark of a republic is not to be found in forts and arsenals and armaments, but in the affections of the people for the government. We sometimes dispute about the term to be applied to our Government to designate its character, some asserting that we are a nation, others that we are a republic, and others that we are something else. But it matters not what terminology may be employed to characterize our form of government, whether we call it a nation, a republic, a confederation of States, a democracy, quocunque nomine gaudet, if it is not founded on the affections of the people it bears within its bosom the seeds of decay and the elements of dissolution.

Do we expect or intend that the process of alienation shall always continue; that there is to be no end to mutual distrust and sectional antipathy? If not to continue forever, when do we propose to change the situation, and how? If sectional hate is a national blessing, let it be promoted by all means. Let us hail its most active propagators as the best friends of the country, and crown them with the highest honors of the Republic. Let us hate each other with all the powers that God has given and the devil has perverted; let epithets that hiss with scorn, words that burn with passion, denunciations that scream like shells through the air, be exchanged between us as fast and thick as bullets flew upon the bloodiest battle-fields of the war. The more we hate each other the stronger the Government will become. Trade will revive under it, commerce will spread her sails on new seas, confidence will be restored, and general prosperity will revisit all the people. The national debt will be borne with cheerfulness and paid without difficulty. Under its benign influence the South will recuperate and grow rich and the great and wealthy North will reap from her re-established trade with the South the golden harvests of other years. The representatives of foreign nations who come to our Centennial will regard the grand display as a national joke, and, lifting their hands in admiration at our discovery of a new way to prosperity and happiness, will exclaim, "Behold how sweet and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in perpetual strife."

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if we have only exchanged a war of the sword for a war of words, the passions of belligerents for a settled hate that cannot be appeased, the Union has only been restored in name, and the mighty conflict waged, professedly to save it, a terrible and melancholy failure. A union pinned together only with bayonets and compressed alone by the strong arm of a powerful government, while the hearts of the people are at perpetual war with each other, is not the Union our fathers formed and is not worth preserving. It is an abuse of the English language and a fraud upon mankind to call it a union. A union of what? A union of the majority to trample the rights of the minority beneath their feet; a union of the victors to divide the spoils, it may be; but the Union that Washington loved, and that Jackson said must be preserved, it certainly is not.

What rational motive can the northern people have for cherishing vindictive and unkindly feelings toward the South? What material interest is advanced by it? What arm of the Government is strengthened by it? What feature of the national character does it render more lovely? What page of our history as a people is it expected to illustrate or adorn? Whose interest requires that it shall go on, and who can possibly reap any benefit from a field thus sown in tares? No one but the selfish demagogue; and as long as the people permit their sectional prejudices to be used as a ladder by which ambition may climb to power, so long will the busy feet of the unscrupulous partisan be seen ascending its rounds.

It has been many long, unhappy years since the minds of the northern and southern people have been sufficiently calm to understand each other, and to appreciate with judicial fairness each other's motives. They did not understand each other when the war commenced; if they had appreciated the situation, humanity requires us to believe that both sides would have paused long before plunging the country into all the horrors of that terrible struggle. I shall always believe—though in this I may be mistaken—that if the voice of the border States, even after the secession of their southern sisters, had been heeded, the war might have been averted. Theirs was the calmest voice that rose above the storm of passion that preceded active hostilities. They knew that their territory would be the battle-field, and upon them would fall the heaviest blows of the war. They were not responsible for the war, whoever else may have been. They exhausted every effort to avert it. They were sincerely attached to the Union, and anxiously desired its preservation. But the war came, against their protest and despite all their efforts to prevent it. And whatever may be thought of the course they saw fit to take, when they were forced to fight on one side or the other, this much may be said in vindication of their motives: They cast their fortunes with the weaker side, and did not seek to save themselves or their property by taking shelter under the protection of the heaviest artillery and with the most powerful army.

But these things belong to the past, to which I do not propose to refer any further than to draw lessons for the present and warnings for the future. If sectional strife has once hurried us into the miseries of war, let us see to it that it never does it again. Let us cease to travel a road beset with so many dangers and that once led us through so many horrors.

Mr. Chairman, he who seeks to perpetuate strife between the sections who engaged in the war insults the grave of every Federal soldier who offered up his life to save the Union and robs the victory won by Federal arms of its chief and only glory. For what purpose was the war waged by the Government of the United States?

When McDowell's well-appointed Army, with flying banners and rolling drums, marched from Washington, it was expected that the rebellion would be crushed as soon as the Federal Army could come up with it, and that the national flag in less than a month would wave over the capitol at Richmond. The man who at that time would have been bold enough to suggest a different result would have been arrested for disloyalty. The result of the first great battle of the war is well known. That magnificent Army that marched out under the inspiration of the gay romance of war soon learned that war was no holiday pastime, and broken and scattered fell back upon the capital in wild dismay. Consternation reigned in the streets of Washington, as the confederate army was hourly expected to enter and take possession of the city. President Lincoln had called for seventy-five thousand troops to put down the rebellion. General Scott, having suggested that it would take three hundred thousand men to suppress it, was charitably set down as in his dotage. The North now began, for the first time, to realize the magnitude of the enterprise on which they had embarked. For the first time they felt that the necessity was upon them to husband all their resources, to make as few enemies and as many friends as possible. Hence, soon after this disheartening and humiliating rout of their Army, on the very next day, I believe, the venerable John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, who had made a noble and patriotic, though unsuccessful, effort to compromise the differences between the sections and thus avert the threatened catastrophe of war and dissolution, came forward in this House and offered the following memorable resolution:

Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States, now in revolt against the constitutional Government and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

This resolution passed the House with only two, and the Senate with only five, dissenting voices.

There is no mistaking the profound concern and painful apprehensions that pervaded both Houses of Congress when this resolution was passed. They stood in the presence of a hitherto unappreciated and unrealized danger that appalled them. Their utterance was a cry of agony from the national heart. They declared that they would banish from their hearts all passion and resentment and would only recollect their duty to the whole country; they disclaimed all intention to oppress or subjugate or conquer the South, and, in clear ringing tones, intended to be heard from one end of the country to the other, and with all the solemnity of an oath, they proclaimed that they were waging war for no other purpose than to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired. If, in the hour of great national danger, with an enemy "in arms around the capital," Congress could thus speak in language too plain to be misunderstood and too impressive to be forgotten, now that those enemies have long since laid down their arms and the supremacy of the Constitution has been established from the Gulf to the lakes and from ocean to ocean, may I not invoke the banishment of all passion and resentment and the recollection of the duty of all men to the whole country, not forgetting the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States in a re-established Union? May I not make the invocation in the names of the brave men who were induced by the promises and pledges contained in that resolution to march to the field of battle and a soldier's grave?

Mr. Chairman, Fort Donelson, one of the great battle-fields of the war, is situated in my congressional district. It was upon that memorable field that General Grant won his spurs and entered upon that career of distinction which made him Commander-in-Chief of the Federal Army, the hero of the war, and finally President of the United States. On a commanding eminence, overlooking the town of Dover, where the battle was fought, is located a national cemetery, where a grateful country has collected the bones of her brave defenders. During my canvass, being in the vicinity, in company with a friend I visited the spot. A wounded soldier, who had charge of the place, received us with courtesy and politeness, and we were permitted to drive within the inclosure and survey the scene. It was as lovely an autumn day as ever smiled upon the earth. From a lofty staff in the center of the grounds the American flag floated gracefully in the breeze. At the base of the hill the beautiful Cumberland, like a belt of silver, glided on its peaceful way. No iron-clad monitors now thundered upon its bosom, and the surrounding hills, no longer swept by the storm of battle, seemed quietly dreaming in the golden light that bathed their summits. Just in sight were the confederate rifle-pits. The winds and rains and storms of intervening years had filled them nearly even with the surface of the earth, and trees as large as a man's body had grown upon the spot where they were dug. I looked upon the graves that lay around me with no other feeling than that of reverence and respect. The grave that contains the ashes of one who had faith enough in his cause to die for it, whether his cause and mine were the same or not, could never fail to command from me the homage due to integrity of purpose and lofty courage. As I walked amid those graves I asked myself the question, "Did these men die in vain? Is the Union they fought to save never to be restored save in theory and in name? Is the sectional strife that preceded and produced the war to still pursue this unhappy country like a sleepless and remorseless Nemesis?"

But the place and its associations called up in my mind thoughts of other men. They, too, with that sublime faith in the justice of their cause which forms the martyr's crown and the hero's passport to immortality, had found a soldier's sepulcher. But no grateful government had gathered their bones into magnificent cemeteries, adorned with all that wealth can command or taste suggest to beautify those cities of the dead. Thousands of them sleep far away from the homes of their childhood, in the deep bosom of forests, where human footsteps rarely tread. The birds of the wild-wood sing their morning and evening hymns above their unrecorded graves. No monumental marble stands sentinel at the spot where they sleep and no ancestral oak shall ever throw its welcome shadow above their heroic dust. By many their names are cast out as evil and hands are not wanting that would write the word "traitor" as the epitaph upon their tombs. But no amount of detraction can shake my faith in their integrity and no temptation of power or position ever make me false to their memories. My blood must turn to water and my heart become as cold as death can make it before I can consent to assail their motives while they lived or insult the humble graves in which they sleep. I know they were actuated by purposes as pure, by a courage as high as ever followed any banner or illustrated the annals of any land. It is not only uncharitable but unjust to regard every man who followed the fortunes of the lost cause as a conscious traitor, devoid of honor and unworthy of trust. Reason rejects such a view of the subject as absurd, justice stamps it as untrue, and the muse of history will decline to transfer it to her immortal page. Questions that rallied so many thousands, as well educated politically as the American masses, to the battle-field for their solution must have had, did have two sides to them. Is it, then, fair or rational for the strong and victorious party to assume that their vanquished antagonists had neither reason nor plausibility on their side, but were actuated in all they did by hearts regardless of all social duty and fatally bent on mischief? I would say to the entire northern people, if my humble voice could reach them, that history has furnished no example where large masses of men have periled life, property, home, wife, children, all that man loves most fondly, all for which he dies most willingly, in a cause which they believed to be wicked and unholy. Believe as firmly as you please that their judgment was at fault and that their views were wholly erroneous. We do not ask you or expect you to believe as we believed on the dead issues of the war.

Our opinions are generally the outg owth of education and association. If, then, your brother, differently educated, differently located, and differently surrounded, has, in your view of the case, erred in his judgment or action, charge not upon him his error as a crime, not to be forgiven in this world or the next. Put yourself in his place, and answer at the bar of conscience whether under similar circumstances you might not have done the same thing. Go a step further. Let him put himself in your place, and answer honestly how you would have him regard and treat you. "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

But it is sometimes urged as a matter of complaint and an evidence of disloyalty that the people of the South have joined what is termed the secession democracy. I invoke the attention of every candid and intelligent northern republican to a few suggestions on this subject. I will take my own case, not referring to myself in any spirit of egotism, but because my case illustrates that of thousands of others.

From my political infancy, I was a member of the whig party, to the day of its dissolution, and acted and voted against the democratic party in all political contests before the commencement of the war. When the war was over I returned to my home, with no other purpose, intention, or desire than to obey the laws and strive as best I could to make an honest living. Very soon, a sweeping act of disfranchisement was passed by a body known in the nomenclature of the times as the Brownlow Legislature. In the county where I live, containing a voting population of about five thousand, not more than two hundred white men were allowed to vote at all. The power given to the governor in the appointment of registration officers was arbitrary and absolute. If such officers dared to register voters whom the executive did not wish registered, the registration was set aside and the recalcitrant officials removed and others appointed in their places. Thus, virtually, the right of the citizen to vote depended upon the will of the governor. Under this system, the voting in my county was done by the recently-enfranchised colored people. I have stood upon the streets of the town where I live, and seen as many as two thousand of these colored voters, marching to the polls in solid column, under the leadership of a carpet-bagger—a stranger to our people, while scarcely a tax-payer in the county was allowed to approach the ballot-box.

It is true I had been conquered, the cause I had espoused had been lost, and the banner I had followed through the storm of battle had been furled forever, but I still had the instincts, the feelings, and the sensibilities of a man who was born free—and all candid men must admit, whatever they may think of the propriety or justice of the law in question, that the system was not very happily framed or managed to induce me to become a member of the republican party. By what to us seemed a providential disagreement between the leaders of the republican party in Tennessee, that State, sooner than her sisters of the South, passed from under the yoke, and in 1870 was enabled to call a convention of her representative men who framed a constitution which conferred upon every man in the State, white and colored, the right of suffrage. During those dark years of proscription and passion you of the North can never know with what anxiety and apprehension we watched the infuriated march of the dominant party over the barriers of the Constitution in the direction of our subjugation. From the serried ranks of that party scarce a gleam of magnanimity could be discerned or a word of kindness and generosity heard. The only voices raised in our behalf, pleading for the guarantees of the Constitution, for oblivion of the past, came from the democratic party. They expressed confidence in our plighted honor, they held out the hand of greeting, and spoke to us words of kindness.

The Freedmen's Bureau was established as one of the inventions sent to plague us, the agents of which robbed the colored man with one hand and scattered the seeds of distrust between him and his former master with the other, thus destroying any system of labor by which we might hope to repair our waste places and rebuild our shattered fortunes. The carpet-baggers descended upon us like the locusts, and the scalawags sprung up among us like the lice of Egypt. These things may have been blessings in disguise, but they were so well disguised that we ought not to be censured if we failed to perceive just where the blessing came in. Could Louisiana be expected to lift her long, bony hands in token of gratitude for the gift of a Kellogg, a Packard, and a Casey; Arkansas to throw up her hat for the republican party for the inestimable boon of a CLAYTON and a McClure? Could Mississippi be called on to sing peans of praise for the reign of Adelbert Ames, the son-in-law of his father-in-law; Alabama to kneel in thankfulness at the shrine of a Busteed and a SPENCER, or Georgia to sing hosannas in the wake of a Bullock and a Blodgett?

Would you expect old Virginia, standing amid the graves of her illustrious dead, to sing the song of jubilee over Underwood and Wells; or North Carolina to be thankful for the distinguished honor of having Holden to rule over her; or Tennessee to kindle bon fires for the services of those loyal men who composed a legislature without constituents and entailed upon her tax-payers a debt under which they are now staggering? Or poor old South Carolina, in rags and wretchedness, trembling with the palsy of reconstruction through every limb of her wasted body, to throw her arms around the republican party for fastening upon her the vampires that have sucked her blood and the vultures that are picking her carcass? No, gentlemen, of the republican party, you have none to blame but yourselves for the unanimity with which the white people of the South have allied themselves with the democratic party. Your leaders in the hour of our sore trouble, humiliation, and despair denounced us as rebels and traitors, having but two rights, one to die and the other to be damned. You inaugurated, confessedly outside of the Constitution, a system of reconstruction that has made some portions of the South a waste howling wilderness, and that which once rejoiced and blossomed as the rose a desert and a solitary place.

I am not now animadverting upon your motives. I am speaking of results. Had your statesmen possessed the magnanimity, the broad and comprehensive patriotism, the grasp of the situation which would have lifted them above the passions and resentments of the hour, how different would have been the result to you as a party and to us as a people. If you could have said to the mutilated and bleeding South, "We have been enemies in war, let us be friends in peace. You have fought us like brave men, long and well, but we are victorious and can afford to be generous. You give us your word of honor that you accept the situation, we believe you—we are willing to trust you. Take your war-wasted country into your own hands and build it up. All the aid that we, who now control this powerful Government, can give you in restoring prosperity to your section shall be freely given. We believe you have grievously erred, but it is human to err. The past is in the eternal past, let us make the future as bright and happy as time and our joint efforts can make it, and we bid you God-speed in all your undertakings to build up your ruined fortunes." If the republican party could have risen to this height, they would have been to-day far stronger in the South and the whole country far more prosperous and happy. But instead of this policy which the situation demanded and a wise statesmanship would have adopted, the colored man, but recently emancipated from slavery, necessarily ignorant of all system of Government, was, with a stroke of the pen, enfranchised; the power to control the destinies of great States placed in his unskillful hands, while the intellect and culture of the South were forced into the background, a course which has entailed upon both races curses from which it will take them years to recover.

I am aware that at the close of the war the republican party manifested great solicitude for the welfare of the emancipated slaves. Of this I do not complain. It was the duty of the Government to see to it that the negro was protected by the laws of the country. But it was a great mistake to assume that the emancipated slave and his former master were natural enemies, and that the efforts of the master would be directed to the maltreatment and oppression of his former slaves. The behavior of the colored people during the war forms a record of which as a race they may well be proud. Their conduct under the trying circumstances that surrounded them disappointed both the northern and southern people. It was expected at the North that they would, under the accumulated wrongs of years, eagerly rush, when the means were put into their hands, to take vengeance on their oppressors. At the South it was feared that, inflamed by appeals to their passions, they would use their newly-acquired freedom by seizing the torch of the incendiary and filling the land with all the horrors of a vindictive and licentious insurrection. But they did neither. In thousands of instances, when the master was out in the confederate army, the faithful negro remained at home with the wife and children until the close of the war, protecting and supporting them. This course on the part of the colored race demonstrated two things: First, that the northern people had misconceived the extent of the sufferings of that race under the institution of slavery, and had consequently exaggerated the wrongs which they had to avenge; and secondly, that the colored man had more principle and honor than the southern people had given him credit for. Left to themselves, without the baleful influence of the bureau, the carpet-bagger, and the premature bestowal of the ballot, the two races at the South would have adjusted themselves in their new relations to each other far more speedily, harmoniously, and satisfactorily. The conflicts that have taken place in the South between them, greatly exaggerated for party effect and earnestly deprecated by the mass of our citizens, have had their origin and inspiration, for the most part, in the evil agencies thrust by the system of reconstruction between the white and the colored people of the South.

It was an unfortunate day for the colored man when the advancement of party interests or the suggestions of a misguided zeal for his welfare required him in his ignorance and inexperience to be transformed into a politician. It was putting into his hand an edged tool with whose use he was wholly unfamiliar, and it is not strange that he should have wounded himself in handling it. The whole race, manipulated by the cunning hand of the carpet-bagger, went ever en masse to the republican party, and became under the influences that controlled them the oppressors of the white race among whom they lived and whose friendship and good-will every instinct of interest would have led them to cultivate, if they had been left to choose their own course. They could not hope to live forever under the shadow of United States bayonets or to remain for all time in a state of quasi infancy as wards of the Government. All these agencies must needs be withdrawn at some time, and the colored man be thrown upon his own resources to shape his own destiny. Even the carpet-bagger in time after he had stolen everything else he could lay his hands on. It was the most natural thing in the world that the colored people should have formed an alliance with the republican party. With their feelings alienated from the southern people by their unfortunate surroundings—not able to detect and most unlikely to suspect the motives of those who controlled them, filled with gratitude to the republican party for their newly-acquired freedom, ignorant of politics and parties—it would indeed have been strange if they all had not rushed into the arms of that party. But a division of political sentiment among them is only a question of time. As they become educated and learn to think, they will inevitably divide. And it will be an auspicious day for them when this division takes place, when they become factors in the success of both parties, thus interesting both in the maintenance of their rights and the elevation of their race. The South is more directly interested in the education of the colored man than the North; for, as he lives in the South and casts his vote there, it is among the southern people that his political power must be felt for weal or woe.

> Would fold his tents, like the Arabs,
> And silently steal away,

Although we believe that the negro was clothed with all the rights of citizenship too soon for his own good and for ours, no one proposes to undo what has been done or to deprive him of the rights he enjoys under the law. As he has been made a citizen by law, let him be made one in fact, by enlightening his mind and teaching him to think for himself. If one man does the thinking for a thousand they will be mere instruments in his hands, and like dumb driven cattle, obey his voice. But let each be taught to think for himself, and the constitution of the human mind will insure a diversity of opinion. Already the more intelligent of the colored race are beginning to perceive the unwisdom of thrusting citizenship upon them immediately after their emancipation, the failure of the reconstruction measures to promote their welfare, and the advantage to them of cultivating friendly political relations with the people among whom they are destined to live.

In the recent national convention held by the colored people at Nashville, Tennessee, the ablest speech made before that body was delivered by Senator C. S. Smith, of Alabama, a colored man and delegate to the convention. Among other things, he said:

> Now, every intelligent man will bear me out that it would have been far better for the General Government, upon the emancipation of the negro, to have given the black man a spelling book rather than the ballot-box. One of the great mistakes which the Government made in its reconstruction policy was to invest the colored people of this country, just emerging from slavery, with the rights of citizenship. I am honest in my convictions. But complaint never remedies an evil. As I remarked before, when these poor colored men were left to paddle their own canoe they drifted out to sea without a pilot, rudder, or compass. Then came the carpet-baggers, adventurers, and robbers, who cast about and took the colored man into their piratical craft and became his leaders.

And again he says:

> I give the republican party a place in the third heaven of my gratitude and affections, but I will tell you the republican party has failed to restore law, peace, and order in this country, and it has failed to relieve the distressed in time of need.

He further proceeds:

> I am surprised at the obstinacy of colored men, who shut their eyes to facts. Turn your backs upon those things which are real, blindly follow the lead of party and not principle, follow the lead of men that have damned us in the past and who will damn us in the future, and you will have cause to deeply regret it. Let us strike hands with the independent conservative element of the South.

The Nashville Daily American, in whose columns the speech was published and from which I have taken the above extracts, says of the manner in which the speech was received:

> As he closed he was greeted with deafening applause. Members of the convention congratulated him, and men, both white and black, rushed upon him from behind the bar and from the galleries and took him cordially by the hand.

Much has been said and written of the outrages committed by the white people of the South upon the colored people, and our whole population have been represented as indulging toward the emancipated slaves a feeling of vindictive hate and merciless persecution. Outrages have occurred in different localities of the South, very much to the regret and against the wishes of the order-loving people of our section. If, under the trying circumstances surrounding both races, conflicts had nowhere occurred, and outrages have been nowhere committed, it would have been a standing miracle in the history of human affairs. The wonder is, not that now and then, and here and there, these lawless demonstrations have been made, but that they have not been more general and frequent. Why, then, bring against a whole people a sweeping charge of inhumanity and lawless violence for occasional excesses, which are the necessary incidents and the legitimate outgrowth of the situation?

I again call on all fair-minded men of the North who love truth and justice to put themselves in our place. Suppose you had been conquered, your property destroyed, your families reduced to poverty, your homes made desolate; and after you had surrendered your arms and given your paroles of honor, the control of your States had been taken from your hands, an ignorant population, your former slaves, put in control of your State governments, you disfranchised and allowed no privilege, save that of paying taxes to support a government carried on by these ignorant and irresponsible voters, manipulated by adventurers, strangers to you, who left their own section of the country for their country's good and your oppression; in a word, suppose you had been called on to pass through the fiery crucible of reconstruction. I ask every honest man in the North, do you think you would have been able to so control all classes of your population that no outrages would have occurred, no outbreaks have taken place? Go feel what we have felt, go suffer what we have suffered, go submit to what we have submitted to, and then judge us as you shall hope to be judged at that great bar where no subterfuge can hide the truth and no self-righteousness evade the fiat of inexorable justice. We have lawless men among us; so have you, so have all communities and all States. None of us can afford to be weighed in millennial balances.

I believe as firmly as I believe I am standing on this floor, that if our positions had been reversed, and you had been placed in our situation and we in yours, there would have been as many, if not more outrages with you than there have been with us. Our war experience was far different from that of the North. Our people who remained at home, and those who went to the field were subjected to a discipline of hardship and a trial of patience that the northern people, who were growing rich all the while, and the Federal soldiers, who were well supplied with all the necessaries, and even such of the luxuries of life as the camp would allow, knew nothing of. And there would have been many more outrages in the South but for the high courage of our people, who, thus trained in the severe school of privation during the war, determined that they would suffer and be strong, and endure manfully all the multiplied evils that beset them, in the hope that a better day would dawn upon them.

The problem between the races will work itself out, and all the sooner and better if the fanatic and the demagogue can get their own consent to leave the matter to the parties more immediately interested in its solution, under the guidance and supervision of a Divine Providence whose counsels we cannot inform and whose methods we cannot improve.

But it is said that the people of the South have shown their disloyalty to the Government by electing to Congress men who were engaged in the rebellion, and by way of derision this is called the ex-confederate House of Representatives. No man occupies a seat upon this floor who is not by the law of a republican Congress made eligible thereto. When you removed the political disabilities of those southern men who occupy seats upon this floor, for which I give you all credit and honor, you by that act proclaimed to the world that there was no reason in your opinion against their filling any position of trust or honor to which their fellow-citizens might see fit to elect them. Whom did you expect the southern people would elect to Congress when you passed your amnesty bill, and by repeated private acts removed the disabilities of such as had been in rebellion? With comparatively few exceptions, the men of intellect and cultivation in the South were all engaged in the rebellion in either a civil or military capacity. The people of their section were in full accord and sympathy with them. They belted on their swords and knapsacks in obedience to or with the full approbation of their fellow-citizens among whom they lived. Why, then, when the war was over, when a republican Congress had by their amnesty acts said there was no longer any cause for treating these men as unworthy or unsafe to hold office, should you suppose that their fellow-citizens would regard them as only fit subjects of proscription and unworthy of promotion? The people of the South did not, and do not now, so regard the men who went to the front, and for four long and bloody years imperilled their lives in a cause which not only they, but those for whom they fought, believed to be right. Nor do the people of the South regard the southern man who honestly and from principle adhered to the Union during the war as unworthy of their confidence and support. They fully recognize his right to his opinions, and respect him for a conscientious adherence to them. This class of high-minded and honorable men must not be confounded with the scalawag. Nor do our people withhold their respect and support from the Federal soldier, nor the honorable northern man who settles among us as a citizen, and does not come to spy out our liberties and defame our character. Let these be carefully distinguished from the carpet-bagger.

But there is a class of men born in the South whom our people despise, and for whom they feel a contempt which they do not seek to disguise. They are men who, in the earlier days of the war, when the confederate flag floated in the breezes of victory, shouted more loudly than any one else for the South, but who, when the night of misfortune gathered around us, took advantage of the darkness to desert their associates, and with loud professions of loyalty to the Union and love for the old flag leaped into the arms of the stronger side, simply because it was stronger. They were actuated by the same motive which impelled Judas to desert his Master and form a conspiracy with the Jews to put him to death—with this difference in favor of Judas, he had conscience enough left, when he had time to reflect upon the baseness of his act, to throw away the money that bought him, and to go out and hang himself—while the scalawag still lives, holds on to the price he was paid, cries for more, and much to the annoyance, in many instances of his new-found friends, clings like a barnacle to the republican ship.

When they came to you with denunciations of their former associates and love for the old flag on their lips, you would have been more respectable as a party in the South if you had said to them, as John the Baptist said to the Pharisees who crowded to his baptism on the banks of the Jordan, "O, generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee the wrath to come?" They joined you for the loaves and fishes; cut off their rations and they will turn upon you and rend you. They belong to a race whose instincts lead them to wag the tail and bark, whether the bone that wins their hearts is thrown from a northern or a southern hand. You may think a man of this character more trustworthy, one in whose hands the honor and glory of this country would be more safe than with the man who faced you in the red hour of battle upon the fields of Gettysburgh and Chickamauga, who followed the fortunes of the confederacy, until, surrendering his arms at Appomattox, he dropped a tear upon the grave where his cause was buried, gave his parole of honor to fight no more, and turned his melancholy footsteps toward his ruined home. But I beg leave to differ with you. In the hands of the man who gave up fortune, abandoned his home, welcomed hardship and suffering, endured the fatigue of the long march, the monotony of the camp, the horrors of the hospital, the peltings of the storm in the lonely bivouac, and faced the dangers of the battle-field, the flag of this country would be far safer than in the hands of all the deserters that ever bent the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow fawning. One drop of his blood would enrich the veins of a thousand scalawags. If you expect our people to elect such creatures to represent them here, they will earnestly ask you to excuse them. They have too much respect for the honorable representatives of the republican party upon this floor to force such an association upon them.

But it is said that the people of the South not only believed during the war that they were right on the issues involved in the struggle, but that they still think so. Well, suppose they do. What difference does it make what any man's opinion may be to-day upon the abstract question of who was right or wrong in the war. All agree that the questions, whatever they were, whatever of right or wrong, of merit or demerit they possessed, have been forever settled, and settled against the South. If there is even a moderately well-informed man at the North who believes that the southern people intend or desire or hope or dream of reviving those issues or that conflict, his ignorance of the truth upon that subject is so dense that I should despair of evidence or argument ever being able to reach him. The idea is so absurd that I would feel absurd myself in adverting to it, if it was not frequently used by the demagogue to arouse his constituents and excite their distrust of us. Our people no more think of resurrecting those questions than they would think of exhuming the bones of those who fell in their defense from the lonely grave-yards where they are crumbling into dust. Their abstract opinions upon those points have no more to do with their fealty to the decision which the supreme arbiter, the sword, has made in the premises, than would their opinions upon the decline and fall of the Roman Empire.

There are not in all the South, outside of her lunatic asylums, fifty men whose opinions are of sufficient importance to be known five miles from their homes who do not believe and feel that it is their duty and their interest and the duty and interest of the people of their section to bear allegiance to the Government of the United States with all the good faith that honest men can exercise and to remand all such questions to the impartial judgment of history, to whose decrees both sides must submit whether they are willing or not. Before that august tribunal where the causes of nations are determined we shall file our record, expect to be represented, and ask to be heard. We desire that posterity shall do simple justice to our motives and that our memories shall not pass to the generations that are to come after us coupled with disgrace. We mean, as far as in us lies, to preserve unchanged and unmutilated the materials out of which the historian shall construct our side of the story of the war. We should certainly be lost to all sense of honor and unworthy the name of men if we could consent, in silence and without a protest, to pass into history so covered with infamy that our descendants would blush at the mention of our names and deny the ancestry from whom they sprang; and this is the whole of it.

The effort to go through the minds and hearts and consciences of the southern people with a lighted candle to ascertain if there are lurking in their hidden recesses any opinions or sympathies or feelings that a loyal man ought to have expelled is a vain and futile undertaking. Since the world began neither the ingenuity of hate nor the omnipotence of power has ever been able to invent a process by which the mind can be manipulated and its thoughts controlled or the heart entered and robbed of its memories. This is hallowed ground on which God has decreed that no tyrant shall ever set his foot. No legislative enactments can reach it, no sheriff with his posse comitatus can search it, no detective can explore it, and no army invade it. It is a fort that cannot be taken, a citadel that cannot be stormed, for the angels of God stand guard upon its parapets and their flaming swords turn every way to defend its approaches.

What we think of the past, how many tears we shed on the graves of our dead, how sacredly we enshrine their memories in our hearts, are questions which belong to us, and to no one else. What we think of the present and what we propose to do in the future are questions that affect us and our children and you and your children.

Mr. Chairman, since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor I have been a silent but not uninterested spectator of what has transpired around me. I have witnessed with pain and deep regret exhibitions of unfriendly feeling toward the section of the country which I in part represent. The very first week of the session was signalized by an assault on the part of a distinguished gentleman from whom I had expected better things. I had been led to believe that he was a gentleman of broad and liberal views and felt kindly toward the unfortunate people of my section, who, if they have sinned, have also suffered much. I had been induced to think that he was too magnanimous to strike a fallen foe and too chivalrous to make an attack where he knew no antagonist could meet him on equal ground to make a defense. But when I saw him ransacking the grave-yards of the war for material with which to blacken the character of a whole people and to arouse passions that every instinct of patriotism demanded him to repress, I was reluctantly compelled to change my opinion of him.

While the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] was pouring out his torrents of bitter denunciation against Jefferson Davis, I could not avoid running a parallel in my mind between his course and that of another no less distinguished statesman of the republican party. When the pale prisoner of Fortress Monroe lay manacled upon the cold floor of his dungeon, bearing in his feeble and emaciated body the sins of his whole people, Horace Greeley, actuated by an impulse which will form a crown of glory to his memory forever, went through a storm of indignant opposition, opened the prison-doors and bade the captive walk out unfettered into heaven's glad sunlight once more. Sir, if I wished to erect a monument to moral heroism, I would lay the foundation-stone upon the spot where Horace Greeley signed the bond of Jefferson Davis! It is by such acts as these that the bitter memories of the war will give place to fraternal feeling.

And here, in passing, let me say of Horace Greeley that he alone of all the leading statesmen of the republican party at the close of the war seemed possessed of those comprehensive ideas of statesmanship, those broad and liberal views which subsequent events have shown were demanded by the situation. The reverberations of hostile cannon had scarcely died away amid the blue mountains of Virginia when he seized the silver trumpet of peace and sounded the reveille of reconciliation. O that the republican party in that critical hour, when statesmen were so much needed, had possessed more Horace Greeleys among its leading men! How much happier, how much more prosperous would this country be to-day! In the light of his illustrious example how do the exploits of the mere politician and partisan pale their ineffectual fires. On the ante-bellum issues and the issues of the war no man, perhaps, in all the North could have been found more distasteful to the southern people than Mr. Greeley. Yet, when the war was over and he came to us with sympathy in his heart, words of kindness on his lips, and the olive-branch in his hand, our people forgot the antagonisms of other days and gave him their support for the highest office in the Republic. This ought to be some evidence to the northern people that our hearts will respond to kindly treatment and that we are willing to bury the past.

When this Congress first convened, a few old war-broken soldiers who were in the rebel army, laboring under the delusion that the war was over, that they were American citizens, that they had a country, and this was its Capitol, came to Washington to run for office. Some of the minor positions were given to them, and so intense seems to be the feeling even against those who occupied the position of private soldiers, that a resolution was introduced with the manifest object of excluding them from all appointments. It matters but little, Mr. Chairman, with the masses of our people whether a few crippled rebel soldiers succeed in picking up here and there a crumb that may fall from the Government table or not. It is the spirit displayed, the rule of action sought to be established by inducing this House to solemnly pass a resolution of the character indicated, that is objectionable. Those men are American citizens or they are not. If they are, then this resolution is unjust and improper; if they are not, and are not worthy to be, so declare, and leave them beyond the pale of citizenship to shiver forever in the cold blasts of loyal scorn or to roast in the furnace of loyal hate. A nominal restoration to citizenship is simply a mockery, if persecution is to follow in the footsteps of pardon and the subjects of national clemency are to become the victims of national spite.

Men who claim to have been loyal in the South cannot present a respectful demand against the Government for payment of losses without provoking the declaration upon this floor that every man in the South who lost a mule during the war has come here to ask the Government to pay him for it, when every member on this floor knows full well that unless the claimant establishes his loyalty and his losses by competent evidence he cannot receive a cent, and in many cases, when both points are proven, he will never get a dollar unless a vigorous constitution should prolong his life to the next centennial. I have heard of cases where the loyalty of the party and the losses sustained have been proven by the most indubitable testimony before the Departments, but without the claimant's knowledge a secret detective has been dispatched, has gone silently and with noiseless step, returned with an adverse report, which the claimant is not allowed to see and which he has, therefore, no opportunity to refute, but on the faith of which his claim is pigeon-holed, there to sleep until Gabriel blows his trumpet, when all the dead shall arise. As long as this patent-right justice is administered to southern claimants, no fears need be entertained of very extensive raids upon the Treasury, unless the tribunals organized to reject claims should prove unfaithful to their trust. The Rhadamanthian justice which decides against the claim and then, with a show of decency, hears the claimant is admirably adapted to shield the Treasury from all claims—the just as well as the unjust. Congress ought to declare that no claim south of the Ohio River shall ever be paid or erect some tribunal where men can have a fair investigation made of their demands and their causes determined not on the irresponsible opinions of a detective—the correctness and honesty of whose conclusions are placed beyond the reach of attack or correction by being concealed in a Department pigeon-hole—nor yet on the utterances of politicians, made in the interest of party, to meet the exigencies of a campaign. I do not desire, I am sure, to see any claim paid which, under the law, ought not to be paid. But the present mode of disposing of the cases of claimants against the Government for war losses in many instances is simply a burlesque on investigation and a mockery of justice.

But my object, Mr. Chairman, was not to discuss this matter of claims against the Government, but to refer to the spirit manifested on the other side of this House toward everything emanating from the South. These repeated flings at our people, these centennial bouquets thrown from the other side of the House to this as fragrant reminders by our republican brethren on this floor of their great admiration for the ex-confederate element over this way, though the pastime may be fun to them, are not as agreeable to us as they seem to suppose. How the welfare of either section is to be promoted by such exhibitions of sectional animosity I have never been able to see. What is the object of it? Is it to degrade us in our own estimation and to call the blush of shame to our cheeks, that our assailants may enjoy our confusion? If so, the unprofitable task might as well be abandoned. It is not to the vain carpet-knight, who struts in all the glory of political regimentals after the war is over and who never smelt sulphur in his life save when his anxious mother rubbed it on him for the itch, that we propose to submit the censorship of our actions or the purity of our motives.

We are here as members of Congress to represent our constituents and to discharge our duty to the country according to the best of our ability. Does any republican upon this floor believe that when the members from the South who were engaged in the rebellion went to the Clerk's desk and took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States we did it with the intention to break it whenever a favorable opportunity might present itself? Do the northern people believe or are you endeavoring to make them believe that we have entered the American Congress for the purpose of subverting the Government or being disloyal to its interests? Do you wish to make the South disloyal? Are you unwilling for her people to return to their allegiance and bring with them all that they can contribute to the future prosperity and glory of the country? We know we took up arms, not, as you say, to destroy your Government, but to establish one of our own, in its constitution and all its essential features similar to the Government of the United States; that when you endeavored to force us back we fought you with all the power and resources we could command. All the world knows this; you know it; we know it, and do not and cannot deny it. But this is past; it cannot be altered. What do you propose to do about it? Do you never mean to forgive it? Do you intend forever to throw into our teeth the hissing words of rebel and traitor and to hold us up to the world and hand us down to your children and ours as infamous beyond the reach of mercy or the arms of charity?

I will tell you what we are willing to do, what we have anxiously desired to do ever since the smoke of battle faded from the last field where we met in the stern clash of arms. I do not propose to gush or centennialize on this subject, but to state the proposition with all the frankness which its gravity and importance demand. When the war closed, President Johnson sent General Grant, the victorious leader of the Federal Army, on a tour of inspection through the Southern States to ascertain and report to him the animus and disposition of the southern people. On the 18th of December, 1865, General Grant made his report, in which, among other things, he said:

> I am satisfied that the mass of thinking men of the South accept the present situation of affairs in good faith. The questions which have heretofore divided the sentiments of the people of the two sections, slavery and State rights, or the right of a State to secede from the Union, they regard as having been settled forever by the highest tribunal—arms—that man can resort to.

And he says further, in the same report:

> My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the Southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing, they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens, and that if such a course was pointed out they would pursue it in good faith.

Such was the testimony of General Grant as to the wishes and temper of the southern people in the very year of the close of the war. It was true in every particular, and I here aver upon this floor that there has never been a day or an hour since that truth was written when the southern people were not willing, ay, anxious to do whatever they thought "the Government required, not humiliating to them as citizens." Such is the temper, such the wish of the southern people to-day. We are anxious to discharge in good faith all our duties as citizens, to contribute as far as we are able to the glory of the American name and the stability of the Government of the United States, but spare us the bitter cup of degradation and a surrender of our manhood. To rob us of this would not enrich you and would make us poor indeed. Waive this demand which manhood forbids you to make and us to yield, and the past can be buried forever. Upon this platform we can meet and shake hands over the graves of our soldiers, and under the auspices of a restored Union march on together in peace and fraternity to grander achievements than we have ever known and a future far more glorious than our past.

Stripped of her wealth, and, I fear, growing poorer every year; crippled by the war, depressed in spirit, staggering under the weight of accumulated debt, the South looks and longs for peace as anxiously as ever the mariner looked for the star by which he might guide his wandering bark aright when "night and the tempest had gathered around him." If any one section of this country has a deeper interest than another in the restoration of fraternal peace and the stability of good government, the South is that section. If the northern people cannot bring themselves to the point of trusting the honor and relying on the pledges of the South, they certainly cannot be unmindful of the fact that her interest in keeping the peace is fully equaled by her inability to break it. But we have no desire to break it. If the flag that floats over this Capitol is not our flag, we have none; if this is not our country, we have none; we are aliens in the land of our birth and exiles in the homes of our childhood. Here the bones of our ancestors are buried, and here we expect our dust to sleep when our weary feet stand still upon the thorny road we have traveled. This country must be the home of our children; they will have no other home, no other country but this; here they must live, here die, and here be buried. For party purposes our loyalty may be doubted, and our names sought to be dishonored and detested, but if the time should ever come when a foreign enemy shall invade these shores and this country needs stout hearts and true to defend it, all will then see in that hour of trial and national danger—

> Whose dripping blade and stalwart arm
> Will hew a red circle in the line,
> And fence their country's flag from harm.

Mr. Chairman, the national conventions of the two great parties will soon convene, when one or the other will nominate the man destined to preside over the affairs of this great country for the next four years. It will be a contest fraught with momentous interest to the whole country, but particularly to the suffering South. Her people will look to it with a concern more painful and profound than they could regard any mere party ascendency. The struggle will possess enough of doubt and uncertainty on both sides to impress each one of the parties with the necessity of husbanding all their resources and putting forth all their strength. From this fact let us indulge the hope that each will be induced to nominate for that high office its best and broadest man.

I do not sympathize with the desire which I have heard expressed by some of my political friends that the republican party may nominate some narrow and sectional partisan, whose extreme and illiberal views may constitute an element of weakness to him in the contest. The situation is far too grave, and the consequences of the election of such a man will be far too vital and disastrous to my section, for me to regard his nomination with any other feeling than that of sincere deprecation. If the democratic party should fail in the coming contest to elect their candidate and victory should again perch on the republican standard, I earnestly trust that the best, the most national, the most just, the most honest, and the most liberal man in all the republican party may be elevated to the Presidency.

The interests of every section of the country demand as the Chief Executive Magistrate the services of a statesman who will stand on an elevation where party will not obscure his vision or passion warp his judgment, and who, by the exercise of a liberal policy and a broad charity toward every section of the country, will make each State feel that it is a State and a component port of the American Union. I hope he will have the breadth of mind to see that one section of this country cannot be given over to ruin and desolation without blasting the other; that the blow which kills the South must also paralyze the North; that he will hold the military subordinate to the civil authority; that he will fill the high places of the Government with statesmen of undoubted integrity and worthy of the high positions to which he may assign them; and that he will appoint to office honest and honorable men in every section of the country, and not a hungry horde of political buccaneers, who will prey upon the people and consume their substance. May no corrupt rings, bloated with Treasury pap and wallowing on the green pastures of executive patronage, be allowed to rob the Government and to degrade the public service, and may the atmosphere that pervades his entire administration be so pure and healthful that official integrity shall again become the rule, and not the exception, in positions of trust and honor. Such a President the country needs, and to such an administration good men of all parties will give their hearty co-operation.

> God gives us men! A time like this demands
> Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
> Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
> Men who possess opinions and a will;
> Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
> Men who can stand before a demagogue,
> And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
> Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
> In public duty, and in private thinking.

During the delivery of the remarks of Mr. HOUSE the hour allowed under the rule expired, and his time was extended by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama.

Mr. DAVIS obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MORTON. May I inquire if the court is not to meet at twelve o'clock to-day?

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 16, 1876, a report of the Director of the Mint, showing the product in gold and silver in the United States and other countries of the world from 1845 to 1875, inclusive; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 19, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the resolution which I now send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a point of order upon that resolution; and I want the Chair to decide whether this is the right time to make an objection to a resolution. It appears from this morning's Journal that unanimous consent was given to the Committee on Printing because the point of order had not been taken in time. Now I make the point before this resolution of the gentleman from Illinois is read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair accepts the point of order as being made now, but the resolution must be read before the Chair can rule on it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does the Chair say that on the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois it will be in order to raise the question of order after it has been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the resolution read before he decides upon it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will it be in time to make the point of order after the resolution is read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves the point of order, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then do I understand the Chair to say that the point of order must be raised before the paper is read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has always been the custom of the Chair to allow a paper to be read for information. How can the Chair rule on it until it is read?

The Clerk read the resolution offered by Mr. MORRISON, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day on the 12th day of June next at four o'clock p. m.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEDMAN'S BANK.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the select committee on the investigation of the affairs of the Freedman's Bank to submit the majority and minority reports, and I ask that they be recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. I object to that unless it is agreed that they shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be understood.

The motion of Mr. DOUGLAS was agreed to.

SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED LANDS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. GAUSE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1253) granting to the State of Missouri all lands therein selected as swamp and overflowed lands, with amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands in the State of Missouri selected as swamp and overflowed lands, and now withheld from market as such, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed to said State, and all title thereto vested in said State; and it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause patents to issue for the same.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "land," insert the following: "And regularly reported as such to the Land Office."

Also, at the end of line 4, add the following: "So far as the same remain vacant and unappropriated, and do not interfere with any pre-emption, homestead, or other claim under any laws of the United States, and the claim whereto has not been rejected heretofore by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or other competent authority."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. JENKS. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the objection comes too late, the amendments having been read.

Mr. GAUSE. I ask that the Clerk read a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 18, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your letter of 15th instant, referring bill 1253, entitled "A bill granting to the State of Missouri all lands therein selected as swamp and overflowed lands," I have to say that I know of no objection to the passage thereof with the following amendments, to wit:

In fourth line, after the word "lands," insert the following:

"And regularly reported as such to the General Land Office."

Between lines 4 and 5 insert the following:

"So far as the same remain vacant and unappropriated and not interfered with by any pre-emption, homestead, or other claim under any law of the United States, and the claim whereto under the swamp-land grant has not been heretofore rejected by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or other competent authority."

Very respectfully,

U. J. BAXTER,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. R. P. BLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GAUSE. The amendments reported by the committee to the bill are in accordance with the suggestions made in that letter.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand this to be a report from the Committee on Public Lands; is it a unanimous report from that committee?

Mr. GAUSE. It is.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GAUSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will ask unanimous consent to lay before the House various bills on the Speaker's table, and if there be no objection, they will be read and referred to the proper committees.

No objection was made.

LICK OBSERVATORY.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 677) granting a site for an observatory to the trustees of the Lick Observatory of the astronomical department of the University of California.

Mr. SAYLER. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be put upon its passage. This matter was considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and I was ordered by that committee to ask the passage of a bill similar to this. It is beneficial to the university and injurious to nobody, and I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAYLER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS REFERRED.

The following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to this resolution, if it is adopted without taking up time.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MEADE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent to present and have referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs a memorial, signed by some 900 citizens of the city of Washington, concerning that portion of House bill No. 3375 as relates to the Washington navy-yard. I also ask that the memorial, without the names, be printed in the RECORD; it is very brief.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition your honorable bodies not to pass that portion of House bill No. 3375 as relates to the Washington navy-yard, for the following reasons:

First. This yard possesses greater facilities for the manufacture of steam-engines, boilers, cables, anchors, galleys, guns, gun-carriages, and ordnance stores of all kinds, as well as the various outfits for naval vessels, than any other station of the United States. Has also within its limits a large copper-refining and rolling mill of sufficient capacity to furnish all the copper and lead required for the purposes of the Navy, even when the entire Navy is in active service. This is the only mill of the kind owned by the Government.

Second. The machinery now contained in this yard cost over $3,000,000, and is in excellent condition, and prepared to execute any work that may be ordered. Besides the immense value of the workshops, offices, officers' quarters, wharves, marine railway, ship-houses, &c., which are all in fine order and fully prepared for the purposes for which they were constructed.

Third. The climate of Washington is such as to permit outdoor work to be done at all seasons of the year, which in itself is an important feature in an establishment of this kind.

Fourth. Ship and other timber can (as an inspection of the records will show) be furnished here as cheap as at any other yard in the country. And evidence is now on record that the water at this yard possesses special qualities (not possessed by any other location) for the seasoning and preservation of ship timber.

Fifth. Coal (bituminous being for the most part used) can be purchased at much lower rates than at any other station.

Sixth. It is the only yard that possesses facilities for the manufacture of guns, iron gun-carriages, and ordnance stores, and has for these purposes a fine machine-shop with all the necessary machinery, as also the finest foundery in the country.

Seventh. The yard being located so near the Department gives its officers opportunity to have immediate supervision over all work to which they may desire to give direct attention, and in case of testing inventions, &c., for the benefit of the Navy Department or Patent Office, the officials of those Departments are enabled to give these tests their personal attention without at the same time neglecting other duties, which would be the case were the experiments made elsewhere.

Eighth. This yard has been established for seventy years, and is now, so far as relates to a manufacturing yard, in a high state of perfection, and to sell or close the same would not in any way result to the interest of the Government.

Ninth. Labor is abundant, and can always be obtained at as low rates as at any other station in the United States.

Tenth. This yard, being located outside of any of the great States, is entirely removed from the effects of political influence, and is thereby enabled to do all work ordered with promptness, and at the same time for much less than similar work costs at other stations.

Eleventh. Vessels of eighteen feet draught can be brought to the yard; and with an expenditure of $100,000 the channel can be so deepened as to admit the largest vessel in the Navy, when fully prepared for service, to come to it.

Twelfth. The water of the harbor is fresh, and affords the very best place of all the naval stations for the placing of the iron-clad vessels of our Navy. There is sufficient area in the harbor of this station to float nine-tenths of the vessels of our Navy.

During the late war nearly all of the shot, shell, &c., used in the Navy of the United States were manufactured at this yard, as also a large quantity of the same articles for the Army. The Government having some years ago discontinued all work at the arsenal in this city is an additional reason why they should not now close this yard.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. JENKS. I move to amend that motion so that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Before action is taken upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I desire to be heard upon a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his question of privilege.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. On the 16th day of the present month the House had under consideration the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VANCE,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing, to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on Printing the report on the subject of the conduct of the Government Printing Office. On that subject, on the 16th day of May, the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] a member of that committee, addressed the House at great length. On the character and temper of that speech I disclaim any purpose to comment. My purpose is to call the attention of the House and country to the fact that in the course of the delivery of that speech the gentleman from Mississippi was interrupted on several occasions by his colleague on that committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BALLOU,] who took occasion to dissent from some of the statements and conclusions of the gentleman from Mississippi and to qualify and explain others of his statements and conclusions. The other gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] made some remarks which I find are also entirely omitted. On the same occasion the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] called the gentleman from Mississippi to order for a breach of the rules of debate in alluding by name to a member of the Senate in violation of the rules of the House. Out of the action of the gentleman from Ohio in calling the gentleman from Mississippi to order grew an exciting and animating discussion, a discussion in its nature calculated to arrest the attention of the House. Of the merits of that controversy it is not my purpose to speak. I merely mention these things to call the attention of the House to their occurrence as a part of the current proceedings of the House.

The speech of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi is printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 17, 1876. In the printed record of that speech the remarks made by the two gentlemen from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU and Mr. EAMES] are entirely omitted. The same also is true in reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the discussion which arose thereon, and the ruling of the Speaker on the question of order.

I should exceedingly regret to give occasion of offense to any gentleman by calling attention to this subject. I disclaim any such purpose. I entertain the highest respect and am animated by nothing but the most friendly feelings for the distinguished gentlemen who participated in that debate. I disclaim any purpose to ask to have placed upon the record anything which would prove unpleasant or injurious. The question is one which, in my judgment, rises above all considerations of personal feeling.

The RECORD was intended to be the faithful chronicle of all that is said and done on the floor of this House. It was intended to be the solemn and authentic memorial by which our acts, our conduct, and our speeches in the order of their occurrence and the language in which they were embodied should go to our constituents and remain for the use and guidance of our posterity. It is of the last importance that this RECORD should be authentic; that it should be a faithful and impartial witness of everything done and said on the floor of this House. The verity of this RECORD ought to be as absolute as that of the judgment of a court of last resort. It should set down nothing in malice, and in it nothing should be extenuated, nothing omitted. Everything should be placed upon the cold, undying record for the judgment of the present and future ages just as uttered, just as it occurred. The interests of truth demand it. The cause of justice to ourselves, to our constituents, and to those who come after us require at our hands that we see to it that we make our record speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

I send to the Clerk's desk for consideration and adoption at this time two resolutions, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the reporters of this House who took down the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. SINGLETON, of the two gentlemen from Rhode Island, Mr. BALLOU and Mr. EAMES, and of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, and the ruling of the Speaker on the point of order made during the delivery of the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi, and which are omitted in his speech as printed in the RECORD of May 17, 1876, cause the same to be fully and truly printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire and report to this House whether any, and, if so, what, amendment is needed to existing rules to require the debates of this House to be printed without any change, alteration, or omission.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Chair hold that that is a privileged question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that, according to the Digest, all matters connected with the omission, change, or alteration of the debates as published in the RECORD pertain to a question of privilege.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call the previous question on the resolutions.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will the gentleman allow me one remark?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to say that so far as the reporters are concerned no blame can attach to them in regard to this matter. I understood from some gentleman, perhaps one of the reporters, who came to me, that it had been agreed by the gentlemen on the other side of the House who had been engaged in the little controversy that took place on that day that they did not care about their remarks going into the RECORD, and my response was that I did not myself care about it. So, I believe by general consent, the omission was made. I have no objection at all to the correction of the RECORD in the manner proposed. I never say anything upon this floor that I am not willing shall go before the House and the country. I am willing that every word of the controversy in question should appear.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire that the exact facts of this case, so far as they relate to me, shall be known. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] whom I do not now see in his seat, came to me shortly after that debate and, as I understood, from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] stating that the gentleman's speech was in manuscript, and asking if I had any objection to allowing it to be printed continuously without the interruptions. I answered that so far as I was personally concerned I had no objection to his leaving out what I had said. The suggestion did not come from me; it came, as I understood, directly in the form of a request through the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.] I suggested either to him [Mr. LAMAR] or to the reporter, who also spoke to me on the subject, that the gentleman's manuscript speech might appear in continuous form, with the interruptions added at the close, and thus the record would be preserved. But I understood it was the wish of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that the interruptions should be left out altogether; and, as I felt it might be ungracious on my part to object, I said that I would make no personal objection.

I quite agree with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] that our RECORD ought fully to show substantially what occurs in the House. No other than verbal corrections should be allowed. In this case I understood that I was only granting a personal favor in consenting that, so far as I was concerned, the small part which I took in that debate might be omitted. The proposition certainly did not originate with me, and my concurrence in it was a matter of courtesy. What I said was what I deemed my duty to say, and I had no desire to suppress it.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish simply to say that it did not originate with me; I had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BALLOU.]

Mr. BALLOU. I think it was one of the reporters who came to me and said that it was the wish of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that the matter should be left out and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] assented. I said that, if such was the case, I should not put in any objection. I assented supposing that it was a request and for the purpose of having the speech appear continuously.

Mr. RANDALL. We cannot hear anything that the gentleman is saying.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House must come to order. The Chair will call gentlemen by name, if necessary to preserve order.

Mr. BALLOU. I do not know that it is worth while for me to repeat what I have just stated. One of the reporters told me that it was the wish of the gentleman from Mississippi that the colloquial remarks should be omitted and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who had taken some part in them had assented to the arrangement. Understanding that such was the general wish, I put in no objection, but assented to it. I wish, however, to say that I made no remark on that day, and I have made no remark in connection with this general subject, which I wish to recall or which I am ashamed to have upon the record; and I trust that while I remain a member of this House I may never do that which I shall be ashamed to have appear.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. EAMES.]

Mr. EAMES. Mr. Speaker, I took no part whatever in the discussion of the resolution reported from the Committee on Printing, but, when the point of order was raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to mentioning the name of a Senator, I did make a few remarks. After the debate was over I learned from my colleague [Mr. BALLOU] that there was an understanding between the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and my colleage that the remarks which were made in the discussion of the point of order should not appear in the RECORD. Upon learning that, I went myself to one of the reporters and stated to him that, inasmuch as what I had said had a bearing simply upon that point, I supposed that my remarks would also be left out. This is all that I have had to do in connection with this matter.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire, before the hour expires, to say a few words more. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. There are two points in this matter which it is well to consider. The first is whether a member should be allowed to review a speech after its delivery. So far I know, that right has always been conceded and in almost all instances exercised.

Now the next point is that which relates to personal matters in debate, about which the House and the public have not much concern. In the spirit of good feeling and with a view to the proper dignity of the proceedings of Congress and the best manner of preserving its records, the practice has always been that a personal controversy on this floor might, by the request and with the concurrence of the parties involved in it, be left out of the RECORD.

Now, in so far as this proceeding is concerned, the two gentlemen from Rhode Island, the gentleman from Ohio, and the gentleman from Mississippi have in no manner, so far as my knowledge goes, acted differently from many, very many, who have gone before. I recollect distinctly, in one instance where I was involved with the Speaker of the House, that he and I agreed the record should be purged of what had passed between us in controversy. Neither of us desired at that time anything we said should appear. It was said, it is true, in the heat of debate, just as what was said by these gentlemen in the debate in which they were engaged, but both the Speaker and myself considered at that time it was proper to eliminate it from the record. I think these gentlemen have not only acted in due line of example, but they have acted so as to make harmony in our proceedings and have reconciled their difference and affronts on the floor in a manner worthy of men and gentlemen.

Mr. PATTERSON. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania refer to any controversy between himself and the Speaker of the present House?

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all, but a Speaker of a former House; and I only brought it up as an example of what has been so frequently done under like circumstances. Mr. BLAINE, then Speaker, suggested to a friend of his, Mr. Peters, of Maine, that the record should be purged, and it was purged, and properly purged, and I felt myself better when it was done, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Maine did after cool reflection, just as these four gentlemen, I have no doubt, do now.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I now yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just one word in reference to this matter. Having during the debate and after its close sat adjoining the gentleman from Mississippi, I presume a great deal of the trouble which has grown out of this matter occurred from the fact that the gentleman from Mississippi, by reason of interruptions on the part of other gentlemen, and the consequent consumption of his time, was prevented from finishing his speech. A portion of the speech which has been printed in the RECORD had not been delivered at that time. The reporters came to the gentleman from Mississippi while I was sitting near him to see how his speech should be arranged for printing in the RECORD. They asked the gentleman if it was desired by him that this controversy should go into the RECORD, and the gentleman from Mississippi then replied that it was a matter of indifference to him; that if the other gentlemen were satisfied to have it go in he was entirely satisfied; that all he desired in the matter was, that if the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio and the two gentlemen from Rhode Island went into the RECORD he should insist, in justice to himself, the remarks he made should go in also, but beyond that he had no interest in the matter whatever.

Sitting next to the gentleman from Mississippi during this conversation with the reporters, it seems to me, in view of the remarks made by gentlemen that they hoped they should never have to expunge anything from the RECORD they had said, that it is but a simple act of justice for me to say this much in reference to the part which the gentleman from Mississippi had in eliminating this controversy from the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, one word more. Much of this debate was injected against the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi, and the gentlemen carrying on this controversy were not recognized by the Speaker at all with any view to make the remarks they did on that occasion.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I introduced this question of privilege on my own responsibility and upon my own motion, without any previous consultation with any person whatever. I did it from a sense of duty. I agree to some extent with the observation made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there ought to be some degree of liberality in correcting remarks which are made extemporaneously on the floor of the House in the heat of debate. But I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these corrections and emendations should not go further than correcting the grammatical sense of the text, or in making merely verbal alterations. Wherever whole paragraphs, whole sentences, in fact whole speeches, are eliminated from the RECORD, then the RECORD ceases to be the truthful exponent of the action and deliberation had on the floor of this House.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a question of order. It is impossible to hear what the gentleman says.

The SPEAKER pro tempore called the House to order, and directed gentlemen to resume their seats.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I was about saying, Mr. Speaker, that I agree, so far as mere verbal or grammatical corrections are concerned, it is proper they should be made; but when it went to emasculation of the RECORD by striking out whole sentences and whole paragraphs, entirely changing the current of debates occurring upon the floor of this House, I for one say I believe that it is a fatal perversion of the purpose for which a record was intended to be kept by the House of Representatives.

It is said that gentlemen on the floor of the House, where two individuals who may happen to become engaged in angry and exciting colloquy, have a right by common consent to cause the records of the proceedings of the House, participated in by the whole members of the House by being present in their capacity as legislators—that these two gentlemen should have the right to entirely emasculate it from the RECORD, and to have the proceedings of this House changed and say nothing of it. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the record of this House should not be allowed to rest at the mercy of any one, whether two or a dozen members upon the floor of this House.

If it is to be worth anything to the country, worth anything to the public history of the nation, if it is to be of any value to posterity, I say that the demand is imperative that the record of our proceedings should be absolutely truthful, and should represent them exactly as they occurred.

We will see, Mr. Speaker, when the vote is taken, whether or not the House will sustain the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that the proposition to correct the RECORD in this case, where whole paragraphs have been omitted, is to be voted down, and the country notified that the RECORD, which the law requires shall be a truthful report of our proceedings, is to be emasculated—not to speak the truth, but to speak so much of the truth as the actors engaged in the debate may see fit to have go down upon the RECORD as the truth. I insist that the cause of truth, that the cause of justice, that the interests of our constituents, and of the country, and of posterity, demand that no man shall be permitted to make the RECORD speak differently from what is really uttered in the progress of debate on the floor of this House. And for one, whenever I see any attempt at omission, or any attempt to make the RECORD speak substantially different from what occurred here on the floor of the House, I will feel it my oath-bound duty to stand up in my place and protest against it, and call the attention of the country to the fact that members on the floor of this House boldly state as a rule that individuals who may have been guilty of conduct on the floor of the House that is unseemly, that they are ashamed of, have the right, without taking the judgment of the House upon it, to change the record in order that it may more perfectly harmonize with the exhibition of the Christian amenities of discussion that ought to have obtained.

I now call for a vote.

Mr. HOOKER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER?]

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I think the debate has gone far enough. I call for a vote.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the whole subject be laid on the table.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 28, noes 177; the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. BAKER of Indiana, were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 139.

So (the affirmative being less than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now insist on my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill. I cannot yield further.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to a question of order. Is it in order to call for the regular order at this time, which is the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rule that that would be in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order this morning would be the call of the committees for private bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the Chair permit me a remark? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] moves to suspend the rules that the House may resolve itself into Committee of the Whole. I submit that that is the regular order, and that if the gentleman had the floor for that motion to suspend the rules to go into Committee of the Whole on an appropriation bill it can be carried by a majority vote. If he had the floor for that motion he had the right to have it put. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires to submit some other motion it can only be submitted by voting down the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HALE. I think that must be very clear. That has been the invariable practice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would rule that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] having been recognized an hour ago, and, being on the floor, having yielded for various matters to a number of members, is entitled to make his motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now make that motion, that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I desire to amend that motion so that when the House shall go into Committee of the Whole the bill to be considered shall be the bill (H. R. No. 2283) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican, Florida, and the Black Hawk wars, and certain widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama cannot move to amend the motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then I hope the House will vote down the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to request the gentleman from Georgia to permit us——

Mr. BLOUNT. Is the question debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to make a request of the Chair.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion about the order of business; or is there such a determination about this business being taken up that we cannot have a word upon the subject? I ask permission of the gentleman to make a suggestion about the order of business.

Mr. BLOUNT. There has been a great deal of time lost already, and I must decline yielding further.

The question being taken on Mr. BLOUNT'S motion, there were—ayes 93, noes 91.

Mr. BRIGHT called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. BLOUNT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 83.

So the motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of the Whole I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Speaker, I was not present this morning when the attention of the House was called to an altercation which took place the other day between my colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the running discussion which occurred between the gentleman from Ohio and my colleague. After that discussion took place, sitting near my colleague, I heard a conversation between him and one of the reporters (who had in his hand the manuscript of my colleague's speech) in reference to the omission from the RECORD of the personalities between the gentleman from Ohio and my colleague. I heard that conversation, and seeing no disposition upon the part of my colleague to initiate anything of that kind I voluntarily, and not at his request, and, so far as I know, without his knowledge, approached the gentleman from Ohio and used this language to him, if I recollect it, though I am not by any means certain of my language: "General, you have no objection to that altercation between yourself and SINGLETON being omitted, have you?" And he expressed, as I understood, a willingness to have it done, which willingness I communicated to my colleague. I understand that this morning the gentleman from Ohio stated that he was in some way under the impression that I came at the request of my colleague, [Mr. SINGLETON,] and that it was his desire that this omission should take place. If I said anything of the kind or if there was anything in the manner in which I spoke to him to leave that impression upon his mind, I was not happy either in my language or manner. I did not intend to convey that impression, nor did I intend to convey the impression to the gentleman that it was even my colleague's desire. I simply understood that these gentlemen privately entertained kindly feelings toward each other, and that there was an entire willingness on the part of each of them that whatever unpleasantness had occurred between them should disappear and not be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to say a word in justice to the reporters; that the rule of the House is that when a member is called to order he shall take his seat, and all matters that occur in the House after that call to order and while the Chair is endeavoring to preserve order and to inaugurate the debate in order were formerly omitted from the RECORD. The Chair is not clear but that they should be omitted now. The only person aggrieved by the omission of anything in that report would be the Chair himself and the gavel used on that occasion.

Mr. LAMAR. I would add that in making the suggestion to these gentlemen I considered it in accordance with the common-law rule of the House, that personalities occurring between two members are within their mutual control, and that they may be stricken out if both agree that it shall be done. I have not only seen that rule acted on but I have heard it repeatedly stated formally from the chair.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman's recollection and my own are perfectly at one. The reporter had spoken to me as he had to the gentleman from Rhode Island, and my answer was that the interruption was in the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi, and not in mine, and therefore I had no control over it. Very soon after that the gentleman from Mississippi came down the aisle from his colleague's seat, and, both from that and from what had already passed, I assumed that he had come at his colleague's suggestion, and I acted on the supposition that I was granting a request from his colleague. But I certainly had no reason or disposition to have anything whatever which I had said stricken out for my own sake, nor did I desire anything to be retained for my own advantage.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, by the courtesy of my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] I am permitted to express my views as a member of a subcommittee on naval affairs in so far as the question of navy-yards is concerned. The measures heretofore presented by the Committee on Appropriations have met with my hearty approbation and commanded my most zealous support. I believe that no stride has been taken in the direction of retrenchment and reform not thoroughly justified by every consideration of prudence, by every requirement of good government, and I rise not for the purpose of opposing the committee in so far as their bill relates to reduction of expenditures, but rather because it has in this respect not fully met the public expectation. The committee charged with the duty of inquiry into the condition of the navy-yards of the United States and of ascertaining whether or not their number cannot be reduced, and, if so, in what mode, have conscientiously examined this whole subject and have had before them nearly one hundred witnesses, and they have in so far as one particular navy-yard is concerned unanimously agreed, with one exception, as to their policy. I am not, however, speaking for the Naval Committee as such, but in my own behalf as one of the individual members of the committee.

I am convinced, after a due consideration of all this testimony so submitted to the committee, after a full examination of all the witnesses competent to testify regarding this subject-matter, that the number of navy-yards, now amounting to nine, can be reduced to three without any detriment to the public service; and that the three which should be retained are the navy-yard at Brooklyn, the navy-yard at Norfolk, and the navy-yard at Mare Island on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Naval Committee have reached any such conclusion or made any such recommendation?

Mr. WILLIS. If the acoustics of this Hall had been more admirably adjusted, the gentleman would have thoroughly understood that I especially disclaimed speaking for the whole committee; that I was speaking only for myself as an individual member of that committee.

Mr. DANFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. DANFORD. The gentleman in prefacing his remarks spoke of the action of the subcommittee on naval affairs upon the subject of navy-yards, their number, &c. As the record shows that I am a member of that subcommittee, I ask the gentleman whether he intends to say to the Committee of the Whole that I, as a member of that subcommittee, agreed to the proposition to which he has referred?

Mr. WILLIS. I now state that in my remarks I have in no wise committed the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD;] I have qualified them throughout.

There is not a doubt but that all the business, all the work of construction, all the work of repairs demanded by the best interests of this country, if committed to a private establishment, could be well executed and well carried out in one immense dock-yard. It occurs to me as very strange that the Government should not in this respect recognize those considerations which govern private individuals in their business affairs. Government work is to-day almost at a standstill. It is justly the policy of this Congress to reduce expenditures to such an extent that construction and repair to any great amount will be entirely out of the question. It, therefore, is befitting when we have such an opportunity, an opportunity that will in no wise conflict with the best interests of the Government, to recognize it and bow to it.

The reason why the Brooklyn navy-yard should be retained is because it is the center of a grand commercial population; within a radius of thirty miles there are more than two millions of people. It is because more than $20,000,000 have already been expended to make it sufficient to meet all the needs and requirements of the naval service. It is because only a few miles back from and above that city the broad Hudson becomes fresh, and iron-clads can rendezvous there without their bottoms being injured and becoming covered with barnacles, without the Government incurring expense. It is because if a notice be posted on the walls of that yard to the effect that workmen are required, before the following morning a response will be made by thousands upon thousands of persons seeking work. It is because, furthermore, that the approaches to the yard, both that through the Narrows and through the Sound, are never frozen up even in the coldest winters.

It is true that other yards possess all these excellencies, excepting perhaps population and the material resources of a great city and communication with all parts of the country. But it being the fact that we can dispense with many of these yards, that only a few should be retained, it behooves us to consider which should be selected for retention.

There is the Kittery navy-yard, a most excellent retreat in the hot summer months, where ships returning from long voyages with their seamen out of health can retire for sanitary purposes. There is Pensacola, which in the contingency of a war with Mexico or with the islands of the Caribbean Sea might be used to excellent purpose. And inasmuch as these yards, if sold, would yield but a small amount of money to the Government, and such sale would involve a great sacrifice, it would not be good policy to dispose of those two yards. A small amount of money should be appropriated to keep them in a state of thorough repair and to secure the Government property from damage.

In my judgment it is entirely proper, as this bill provides, that the navy-yards at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and Washington, District of Columbia, should be sold at such time and on such condition as will be most advantageous to the United States. Herein we take no issue with the Committee on Appropriations. The reason why we recommend the sale of these yards is predicated upon the fact that the land is situated in the heart of two cities, and when the country shall have recovered from its condition of depression and paralysis of industry the ground will undoubtedly command a fair market price.

In connection with this subject of dock-yards I shall take the liberty of reading an extract from Barry's work on dock-yard economy, the ablest author who has written upon this subject, and a work which shows a thorough familiarity of the author with the dock-yards of both France and England and with the whole system of dock-yard economy.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like the gentleman to explain to this House why in a preceding Congress—I think in the Congress before the last—an effort was made here by a representative from the city of Brooklyn to secure the sale of the Brooklyn navy-yard. He introduced a bill for that purpose and urged it here. What was the reason for urging the sale of that yard? I do not want to interrupt the gentleman in his remarks, but I think this is a proper place for him to give that information.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman who introduced that bill must upon his own conscience answer what were his motives for the act.

Mr. O'NEILL. I merely asked the question because I thought the gentleman now representing the district in which the Brooklyn navy-yard is could tell us why the citizens of Brooklyn at that time through their Representative on this floor, a very able gentleman, urged Congress to authorize the sale of the Brooklyn navy-yard.

Mr. WILLIS. I suppose that the reason was that heretofore it has been an administration nursery, where a good many republican votes have been manufactured for the thirty days preceding elections. I am impartial in this matter. I represent neither Brooklyn nor Philadelphia.

I will now read from the volume which I have named and now hold in my hand:

There is an obvious consequence of some importance arising out of this first intention, (of dock-yards.) It is that, as the dock-yards have their origin in the necessities of naval war and in the absence of great private establishments in which ships of war could be built, there is not another word to be said in support of the continuance of the dock-yards than that they exist, or, what is the same thing, that we possess them. Manifestly, if up to the present time war had been unknown, and all at once its ghastly forms presented themselves to men's minds as something with which at last they must become familiar, no sane man would have thought of providing ships in any other way for the public service than ships are provided for private persons; because, if it were impossible to supply the public service properly, the question would arise whether it would not be as much the duty of the Government to save private persons from what we shall call the rapacity and incompetency of the ship-builders as to save the public. From this conclusion there is no logical escape. Some may answer that the dock-yard work is better and more to be depended on than ship-yard work; but surely it must be apparent that this is only saying the dock-yard officials are incapable of superintending ship-yard work, and that workmen cannot perform their tasks in so satisfactory a manner outside of the dock-yards as they can within. The objection, it will be shown hereafter, is altogether groundless. The first intention of the dock yards was to provide that which could not be conveniently or so well provided elsewhere; therefore all that the warmest friends of the dock-yards can rationally say in support of them is that we have them, and for that reason we ought to use and cherish them. But exactly the same logic would lead us to use and cherish the coats of mail in the Tower of London, because we have them, and the battle-axes, broadswords, and unmelted cannon of the last century that still encumber our great arsenals.

Mr. Chairman, these reasons must commend themselves to all intelligent men. Now, all the work that needs to be done for the United States Navy can be done better in one yard than in eight yards. Yet we have eight separate establishments. We have the bureau system carried into each yard. We have sixty-four distinct sets of books where we should have but one. We have sixty-four clerks where we should have but one. We have eight different parties acting as responsible heads where we should have but one responsible head. Without reference to what ought to be done regarding other yards, there can at least be no discussion as to what ought to be done regarding the creation of a new dock-yard. Notwithstanding the manufacturing interests of this country had climbed to that height where ships could be built with the same facility and at as slight cost in this country as anywhere else upon the globe; notwithstanding in every exigency we have been compelled to resort to private enterprise to enlarge our Navy, we find this Administration, after a period of war, when the people were burdened with a mountainous debt, devising a method whereby another large load shall be added to the oppressive weight and thrust upon our people. A commission, composed of seven distinguished officers of the Navy, at the head of which was Commodore Stringham, was appointed to select a new navy-yard; and the majority of that commission reported that it was utterly incompatible with the public interests to establish a navy-yard at League Island. But we find that by virtue of political maneuvers, by virtue of tactics with which I am unfamiliar, the Government was induced to resolve upon this change, resolved upon it notwithstanding what was contained in the report made by the majority of that commission.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let the gentleman frankly say that in establishing the navy-yard at League Island it was always the intention to do away with the old Philadelphia navy-yard.

Mr. WILLIS. Undoubtedly. In obedience to the wishes of Philadelphia, which city wanted a double bounty—a navy-yard removed, a navy-yard created.

Mr. O'NEILL. Because Philadelphia had the best place in the world to offer for a navy-yard, as is established to-day.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] will allow me one moment——

Mr. WILLIS. If my time is limited I must insist on proceeding. If gentlemen wish to indulge in ipse dixits, they must seek some other time and occasion. I will now read from a report made by experts who, if they were men of only tolerable understanding, must be as capable as the distinguished gentleman from Philadelphia of coming to a correct conclusion upon this subject.

I read from the report signed by a majority of this commission:

League Island is a reclaimed marsh, surrounded by a dry stone wall and embankment of earth, raised to erebude the river. A portion of the island was reclaimed many years since, and is known as the old meadow; we have no positive information on this point, but presume that at the time the wall and embankment were built all the land worth reclaiming was embraced within the inclosure; subsequently, and about eighteen years since, as we are informed, the inclosure was extended so as to embrace an additional area, now known as the new meadow. According to a plan which has been submitted to the board by a committee from the board of trade, this old meadow contained two hundred and nineteen acres and the new meadow one hundred and fifty-five acres. On the north of the island, and between it and the main there is a channel, which we are told was of sufficient depth in former days to float large ships of war; now it is a narrow and shallow channel, not sufficient to float vessels of any size used by the Navy. Large areas of marshes have formed on the east and west ends and on the north side of the island, and the whole appearance indicates a constant and rapid accumulation from the immense deposits of the Delaware River.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to what I am about to read further:

To raise the surface of this island to a height which would render it safe from the encroachments of high tides will require a filling in of from nine to ten feet over the whole area; and if, as has been suggested, a line of wharf front be carried out to the twenty-three-foot line, it will involve an additional filling of a space one mile long and averaging four hundred and eighty-one feet wide and nineteen feet deep.

Mr. Chairman, I will also call the attention of the committee to another feature of this report which, in my judgment, is of supreme importance in the consideration of this matter:

League Island is situated on a fresh-water river, nearly surrounded by marshes covered with vegetable matter and exposed to the sun at every low tide during the day; and, although we are told that it is as healthy as other places in the vicinity, we cannot believe that League Island can be regarded as a healthy place.

And then the majority of this commission—

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the board, the public interests will not be promoted by acquiring the title to League Island for naval purposes.

It is signed by S. H. Stringham, presiding officer; W. H. Gardner, commodore; G. J. Van Brunt, commodore; and W. P. S. Sanger, engineer.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman from New York please give the committee the date of that report?

Mr. WILLIS. I will permit my friend from Pennsylvania to pursue the subject at his leisure, but will not permit him to interrupt me.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will insert in his speech various other reports in favor of League Island which have since been made as a set-off against that solitary one against it.

Mr. WILLIS. I have already stated to the committee that this is an original report made by competent experts and is in all respects sufficient for our purpose, but despite the filing of such an opinion, and the due consideration thereof, various contrivances have been resorted to which have resulted in a pledge on the part of the Congress of the United States to impose upon the people of the country a foolish and utterly unwarranted expenditure of at least $40,000,000.

In addition to what has been before urged in regard to League Island, let me say that it is no less than seventy miles from the sea. A few vessels of the enemy rendezvousing in its mouth could blockade the grand navy which happened to be at that particular point, and prevent its issuing forth to protect the coasts of the country.

There is beyond this still another objection. Every winter, sometimes for months, those narrow channels which surround that mud-flat, properly called an island, for it is very much of an island, being surrounded by water on top as well as on all sides—those narrow channels are blockaded by ice, rendering League Island useless for any just purpose for which navy-yards are maintained.

But I do not wish to detain the committee longer on this subject-matter. I wish to justify the position that has been assumed by myself in making the report of the subcommittee on this subject. When the proper time comes, in view of all the considerations presented, I shall take the liberty of moving an amendment to give effect to the recommendations urged in that report.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask a question?

Mr. WILLIS. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. RANDALL. Did you ever personally inspect League Island?

Mr. WILLIS. I did not; but I trust to the eyes of Commodore Stringham rather than to the judgment of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania on this question.

Mr. RANDALL. When you rely on another, then we will come back to his say-so. For the gentleman himself to rise up here and inveigh against League Island when he has never seen it, as he himself confesses, seems to be a most extraordinary proceeding.

Mr. WILLIS. I saw it sufficiently in the report, made by eye-witnesses, who thoroughly understood their duty in the premises.

Mr. RANDALL. That is on paper.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish also to say on this subject that although the Navy of the United States is very inconsiderable compared to that of France or Great Britain, France having 402, England 242, and the United States 117 ships of war, the acreage for dock-yards in England amounts to only 866 acres, and in France to only 865; while in the United States, exclusive of League Island, it amounts to 1,595 acres. The fact appears by the following tabular statement:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS, May 17, 1876.

I also add as part of my remarks the report of the subcommittee, written by myself, and which is the embodiment of my views and suggestions upon the subject I am now discussing:

The subcommittee on naval affairs, who were instructed to take into consideration and investigate the subjects embraced under the second head of the subdivision of House resolution No. —, introduced by Mr. MORRISON, namely, "On navy-yards and their management, to inquire whether their number may be reduced, and, if so, in what mode and to what extent, and, in their management, what change can be made to reduce the costs thereof, and reform the alleged abuses and corruptions existing therein," respectfully submit the following as their report:

The United States Government now possess the following navy-yards, to wit: Washington, Norfolk, Kittery, Brooklyn, New London, Charlestown, League Island, Pensacola, and Mare Island, all, save the two latter, being situate upon the Atlantic coast.

After considering duly a vast amount of testimony bearing upon the subject-matter, the scope of work to be done in and about the repair and construction of vessels and other labor required by the Navy, having due reference to the efficiency of the service, your committee recommend:

First. That all navy-yards be closed, excepting the one at Brooklyn, the one at Norfolk, and the one at Mare Island, which be kept open for the purposes of repair.

Second. That eventually but two yards be maintained and kept open, to wit, the one at Mare Island and the one at Brooklyn.

Third. That no naval station be authorized or established unless in case of necessity when it shall be selected at such of the closed yards as may be most expedient in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy.

Fourth. That sale be made of the navy-yards at Charlestown and Washington with all convenient speed.

Fifth. That the Kittery and Pensacola yards be retained as Government property, that the same may be used in period of war or other exigency.

Sixth. That no further money be expended upon League Island, and that said island, together with the yard at New London, be receded to the original grantors at such time, in such mode, and upon such conditions as may be deemed expedient and just; and, at all events, that no further money be expended in the creation, enlargement, or improvement of either.

Seventh. That provision be made to guard, at the slightest possible cost, all the property and material of any description whatsoever in or about the yards to be closed pursuant to the foregoing suggestions, until the same may be disposed of with the least prejudice to the Government.

The foregoing recommendations have reference to the first branch of the inquiry, as hereinbefore stated. The yard at Brooklyn is confessedly the most valuable and important one owned by the Government. The testimony of all witnesses examined is uniform in this respect, and, without reference to its intrinsic excellence and fitness, it is, while sufficiently remote from the sea for purposes of defense, sufficiently convenient for the purposes of coast defense; it would cost more than $20,000,000 to replace it; it has at hand all the resources of men and material which a commercial city in communication with every part of the country, containing more than a million of people, can yield, and there are yet a million more of people within a radius of thirty miles. The approaches to the yard by Sound or Narrows are never frozen up. A notice that workmen are required posted upon the outer gates of the yard is responded to by thousands within a few hours. A few miles above the city the waters of the broad Hudson become fresh—a retreat just at hand where a fleet of iron-clads could rendezvous and avoid the inconvenience or damage resulting from salt water. One yard is sufficient for all the purposes of the Government, where all the resources of the Government could be centered and work prosecuted under the control and direction of one competent official, avoiding the confusion inseparable from having the business of the Navy divided up under so many different heads, dividing responsibility and thereby reducing effectiveness to the minimum.

Other yards have undoubted excellences, but can be dispensed with. The best of these upon the Atlantic coast, reference to geographical position, depth of water, distance from the sea, and defensibility being considered, is Norfolk. League Island is too remote from the sea; is upon narrow rivers, which are invariably blocked every winter with ice, sometimes for months; it is near a large city; is accessible to coal and iron regions, and the water is fresh; considerations indeed favorable, but overshadowed by an objection to its locality, its annual blockade of ice; and another yet more commanding, indeed, insuperable, the immense cost which its completion would necessitate. Let us reign ourselves with composure to the amount of money already uselessly expended and halt where we are. The sum of money required to complete the yard, to render it in anywise fit for the purposes intended, is variously estimated at from twenty to sixty million dollars. The island is nothing but a mud-flat, which will require endless filling and piering; it will require for years and years an annual appropriation from Congress, and the American people should decide, before further money is invested, whether they are willing to pay the cost of this yard, say, at a low estimate, $40,000,000.

A naval station in time of peace, when so many navy-yards are scattered along the full length of our coast, is wholly needless, and, unless made such with no outlay, without justification.

The land comprising the Charlestown and Washington navy-yards, being in the central portions of large cities, could be advantageously sold, especially when the country shall have recovered from business depression.

The land comprising Kittery and Pensacola would, if sold, yield but a trifling sum of money to the Treasury, and their retention may be of ultimate service to the Government.

As League Island and New London were respectively ceded to the Government on condition that they should be used as navy-yards and naval establishments maintained thereon, good faith demands that in due time proper steps be taken to surrender the same and cause their reconveyance to the bodies-politic from whom they were received.

The value of governmental property at the several yards designated as proper ones to be closed is immense, amounting to several millions of dollars. The most prudent precautions must be employed to prevent destruction either from want of care or removal. A proper amount of money, therefore, appropriated for such purpose would be an intelligent exercise of economy.

Respectfully submitted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] whether the subcommittee or the general Committee on Naval Affairs have ever taken any testimony whatever on the subject of the sale of any navy-yard of the United States?

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to say distinctly that they have. But in so far as my remarks are concerned and in so far as this particular appendix, which I have asked leave to print, is concerned, they are my own individual views, and I am alone responsible therefor, although I believe for the honor and credit of this Congress that they will be shared and sustained by a majority of the members thereof.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I would ask my friend if he has ever visited any navy-yard in this country except that of Brooklyn?

Mr. WILLIS. It is not my business to travel around, after the manner of clowns, looking at what may be in Boston, or what may be in Philadelphia, or sundry other small towns. But I have sought information from such genuine and authentic sources as must put all gentlemen to the blush who would indulge in any statements to the contrary, not having the knowledge of experts on the subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman from New York is so obliging that I really dislike to ask permission of him to say a word.

Mr. WILLIS. Justice to my distinguished colleague on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] compels me to say that I must yield to nobody but him.

Mr. O'NEILL. There is one question I wish to ask the gentleman, whether he was ever in the Brooklyn navy-yard?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and now the gentleman, having placed himself on the witness-stand and wishing to testify, he may state whether there is anything in the report signed by Admiral Stringham and four other naval officers which is not strictly true.

Mr. O'NEILL. That report belongs to a past generation of men; forgotten almost, except for their deeds in the Navy of the United States fighting her enemies gallantly.

Mr. WILLIS. And with them simplicity and true economy have been also forgotten.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] yield to me for one moment?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. For what purpose?

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to express the hope that these gentlemen who are participating in these personal altercations which are so rich will not strike them out of the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I hope they will not go into the RECORD. They were out of order, every one of them.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is not my purpose on this occasion to review the general condition of the Navy. I had hoped that prior to the discussion on this bill it would have suited the convenience of the Committee on Appropriations to have reported the Army appropriation bill, with the view that whatever reduction might be made in the pay of the Army that reduction should be made in the naval service, so that the services hereafter would harmonize alike in their assimilation of grade and of pay. That has not been done, and there has been brought upon the House, and more particularly on the Committee on Naval Affairs, the consideration of questions that they would have liked to be postponed for the reason I have intimated.

I purpose simply on this occasion, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the House to what I have been instructed to do by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to wit: To offer for the consideration and approval of the Committee of the Whole three distinct propositions, which are to be found embodied in the bills which I had the honor to report from that committee the day before yesterday.

These bills refer, first, to the reduction of the pay and the number of officers in the Navy; secondly, to the reduction of the navy-yards; and, thirdly, to the re-organization of the Marine Corps. And it is to these subjects that I propose now to call the attention of the committee.

The first, sir, is the question of the reduction of pay. In order that the Committee of the Whole may fully understand the purposes and labors of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I have to invite your attention to what is the present pay of the Navy and to what is proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. Speaking in round numbers, without referring now to the bill, the amount reported by the Committee on Appropriations is $6,250,000, while the sum of $7,600,000 is demanded in the estimates submitted from the Treasury Department. I am of the opinion that, if the recommendations made by the Committee on Naval Affairs shall meet the approval of this House, the sum reported from the Committee on Appropriations may be reduced from four to five hundred thousand dollars; in other words, making the appropriations $5,750,000.

Now, sir, in the amendment which I shall have the honor to submit to this committee—I speak relatively or comparatively—the proposed reduction averages about 10 per cent. in the pay of officers upon the active and retired list. At that point the committee for the present stopped. They propose in the discharge of the duties devolving upon them to submit to this Congress before it adjourns sundry other measures which, in the opinion of the committee, will materially reduce the expenses in the management of the Navy. But just now, sir, I desire to invoke your particular attention to this statement. I submit it as a statement merely, and I ask the attention of the Committee on Appropriations, or the gentleman who has reported this bill, or of any gentleman who takes an interest in the naval service, to the fact that I have correctly tabulated the present rate of the pay of the Navy. I submit the tabulated statement showing that expense, as nearly as it can be done from the last Naval Register:

Staff officers, active list, (592)		1,562,600
Line officers, retired list, (109)		333,825
Staff officers, retired list, (135)		224,030
Total pay commissioned officers		4,022,955
Warrant officers, active list, (212)	$270,600
Warrant officers, retired list, (28)	28,650
Cadet midshipmen and engineers, (317)	158,500
Mates, (50)	18,000
Estimated for officers volunteer Navy		40,400
		4,539,105
Estimated pay for petty officers and seamen, &c., 7,500, at average of $20 per month		1,800,000

Will you reflect, gentlemen, for a moment on the fact that the number of officers on the active list of the Navy line and staff is to-day 1,368; that those upon the retired list, including chaplains and professors of mathematics, foot up a total of 1,612 officers; and if you add to this the cadet midshipmen and the cadet engineers you have a total of 1,924, and adding to that number the volunteer officers, which the amendment which I propose to offer will abolish, you have 1,953 officers for the United States Navy, that number including the cadet midshipmen and the cadet engineers, who are officers in embryo? Now then, take 1,953 as the number of our officers who either are commissioned or may be commissioned, and you have that number of officers commanding 7,500 men. Is it not time, in view of the immense amount of money that you are paying to this class of officers, that you should commence the work not only of reduction of pay but of reduction of their number? The Committee on Naval Affairs, believing the establishment to be top-heavy, and representing the great body of the taxpayers of the country and not representing one particular class, believe it just to the people that the reduction should be made not alone among sailors, but among the officers of the Navy. I apprehend that no man will take issue with me on that question; but the difficulty with the committee was how it should be done with justice to the officers of the Navy. We got over that difficulty by providing that hereafter in the rank of rear-admirals the number should be reduced from twelve to three; that we awaited the slow process of death or retirement to make that reduction. The number of commodores is now twenty-five, and we propose to reduce it to six, and so on, following that idea through all the grades of officers, with the intention that the number of officers in the Navy shall eventually be made to correspond with the number of men in the Navy.

In addition to that I desire to call the attention of the committee to the further fact that to-day—and I am making no comment or reflection, nor do I so intend anything I may now say on the management of any party or of any Secretary—but I do call attention to the fact that to-day, with all of our efforts, it would not be possible to put into commission or to put afloat more than eighty vessels. We have to-day in the squadron service or active sea service but fifty-one vessels, and merely for the purpose of keeping those fifty-one afloat the people of the United States are taxed over $4,000,000 to sustain an unnecessary number of officers. Right here, Mr. Chairman, speaking for the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I desire to say that they have no thought or purpose whatever to make war on the Navy. I think myself, as an American citizen to-day and as an American citizen in the past, I have never seen an hour when I did not feel honor and pride in the officers of the Navy of the United States. They are gallant soldiers and men of courage, who do honor to the service and the flag under which they have taken commissions, and I would be false to myself and false to justice and false to my country if I made war upon the Navy. And in all the efforts I make for reform and reformation I have not one single object or purpose except to so reform and re-organize the Navy that it may become hereafter in the time of peace what it always has been in time of war, the pride and honor of the country. But, sir, right in that connection, and speaking of the pay of the Navy, it will appear upon reference to the expenditures, as reported from the Treasury Department, made for the naval service from 1869 to 1875 that there has been paid out within the period of six years for the pay of the Navy, Marine Corps, and the incidental expenses connected with the service, aside from the Bureau expenditures, $64,140,767.90.

Now, gentlemen, reflect for a moment that this large amount has been gathered from your tax-laden and oppressed constituents within the last six years, an amount of $64,000,000 and over.

Now, sir, in view of these facts, upon which I think no gentleman will take issue with me, I submit to the House that it is our duty to travel in the direction indicated by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that upon this question of the reduction of pay and number of the officers of the Navy I shall take occasion to trespass upon the attention of the committee when we consider the bill by sections, but just now I pass from that question to the next, and that is the question of navy-yards.

I am not here upon this occasion to give expression to any individual sentiment that I may have. I only express myself generally and as the representative of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Their recommendation has for its object and purpose economy and efficiency in the naval service. With that end and purpose in view they have authorized and instructed me to recommend the passage of a bill which abolishes the navy-yard at League Island and at New London, but retains for general purposes the navy-yards at Kittery, Charlestown, Brooklyn, and Norfolk, and retains for special purposes the navy-yards at Pensacola and Mare Island.

Now in reference to the Pensacola navy-yard; it is, I believe, a matter well known to most of the gentlemen upon this floor that during the continuation of that yard it has seldom been used for any other purpose than as a rendezvous and repairing station; that in the whole history of that yard but one or two vessels have been built there. And the recommendation of the committee in regard to the Mare Island navy-yard is in harmony with its past history.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. What facts in the possession of the Committee on Naval Affairs have caused them to recommend the discontinuance of the navy-yard at Mare Island and the making it a naval rendezvous?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. A rendezvous and repairing station.

Mr. PAGE. Yes. Does not the gentleman know that for the two thousand miles of the Pacific coast there is but the one navy-yard at Mare Island? I would like the gentleman to inform the Committee of the Whole upon what information or facts in possession of the Committee on Naval Affairs they base this recommendation.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The information in possession of the committee was that there was not means enough at hand in the form of timbers and other materials to make the navy-yard at Mare Island a general construction yard. It is within the information of the committee that vast amounts of timber and other material at very great expense—I can use no other term—at very great expense to the Government have been transshipped or carried from our eastern sea-coast to Mare Island; that in the articles of live oak and coal and other things the Government has been obliged to pay enormous prices to secure those articles. And in the opinion of the committee no more should be done at that yard than has been done in the past; that is to say, nothing but the necessary repair or construction of a vessel.

I do not mention it as a fact within the knowledge of the committee, but I mention it only upon that information which is accessible to every gentleman upon this floor. It is said that a gentleman in the State of New York is now building a vessel to be put together at Mare Island, and instead of sending the various parts of that vessel by water, he is sending it across the country by railroad.

It was in view of these facts and with no intention or purpose on the part of the committee to prejudice the Mare Island navy-yard, simply to keep it within its past history, that we recommend that it should be retained as a repairing yard as well as a naval rendezvous. The gentleman misapprehends the bill of the committee if he supposes that the Mare Island yard is to be simply a Navy rendezvous. In the opinion of the committee there should be done there in the future what has been or ought to have been legally and legitimately done there in the past.

Mr. PAGE. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] but I would ask him, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, if he would deem it safe, with two thousand miles of sea-cost, and Mare Island the only navy-yard on that coast, to do away with that navy-yard as a yard of construction? I believe that in the past ships have been constructed there, immense works have been done at Mare Island, and the cost of such works, I think, will bear favorable comparison, so far as economy is concerned, with any other navy-yard in the United States, with the exception perhaps of some additional freight paid upon certain classes of timber.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I think when my friend from California [Mr. PAGE] comes to understand thoroughly the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs he will see that that action is not as prejudicial to his navy-yard as he now takes it to be. The committee have reflected upon the number of vessels likely to be repaired at that station. For instance, whatever squadron may be maintained by the United States upon the North or the South Pacific, the vessels would have to go to this navy-yard for repairs, and very likely the draught upon the resources of that navy-yard, in the way of material and other supplies, will in the future as it has been in the past be larger than their capacity to meet.

There are things alleged about that yard which, I will not say have caused the country to wonder how they could be, but there are things which if true I have no doubt the gentleman regrets. I do not intend now to assert that they are true, but if they be true they ought not to exist in the future. It was with these views that the Committee on Naval Affairs made the recommendation as to the Pensacola and Mare Island navy-yards.

When we come to the other yards, Kittery, Charlestown, Brooklyn, and Norfolk, I agree with my colleague upon the committee, who has just addressed the House, [Mr. WILLIS,] that the navy-yards at Brooklyn and at Norfolk are essential to the public service, and I might here announce my own willingness to pause; but I am here to represent, on behalf of my committee, that the navy-yards at Kittery and Charlestown are not without their advantages to the service. In the opinion of the committee those advantages are of such a character as to demand the continuance of those yards as general stations. For Kittery it is to be said that, when our ships have been upon long voyages and the vessels as well as men have become infected with disease, it is necessary that they should be carried to some water in the latitude of the Kittery navy-yard; and it was for this general purpose that the majority of the committee thought it their duty to recommend the continuance of that yard.

As for Charlestown, it possesses advantages in the manufacturing of certain articles such as are not possessed by any other establishment in the Union, especially in the manufacture of rope. At that yard the Government, as I am informed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] my colleague on the committee, is able to carry out a policy which I trust will ever be the policy of the Navy Department—not to permit any shyster or broker-contractor to come between them and the manufacturer of the iron which goes into the construction of our ships. If the Charlestown navy-yard possesses this advantage, it certainly should be preserved as a manufacturing establishment for the benefit of the United States Navy.

The navy-yard at Washington City, it will be observed, the committee recommend to be continued as a manufacturing establishment. It is said that this yard has machinery whose ability to execute fine workmanship is not equaled, certainly not surpassed, by any establishment in the world. With this general idea the Committee on Naval Affairs have recommended that the Washington navy-yard be continued as a manufacturing establishment.

I have given the reasons why certain yards should in the opinion of the committee be continued. I now come to those yards of which they recommend the abolition. I cannot appropriately discuss or give to the committee the reasons that operated upon the mind of the Naval Committee in recommending the retrocession of League Island to the authority that gave it to the United States; but, sir, with proper time and opportunity I think my friends from Philadelphia will find that the Committee on Naval Affairs have reasons as thick and plenty as blackberries. No reason can be urged for the continuance of a navy-yard at League Island that would not apply to every fresh-water branch that enters the Atlantic Ocean. That is the only argument that can be made in favor of League Island. But, on the other hand, the committee will bring to the attention of the House and the country the fact that to make League Island a navy-yard will require an expenditure from the public Treasury, at the very lowest estimate, of $20,000,000, and in the opinion of competent officers recently on duty at that station, $50,000,000. In view of this expenditure the question will be presented whether this House is willing to launch this country into such an expenditure for the building of a navy-yard there, when we have superior yards already in existence. That is the only practical question before the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have not the time.

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will state that League Island navy-yard was established as an iron-clad navy-yard, for which fresh water was a necessity, he will perhaps discuss this subject more intelligently.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] declines to yield.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. This question will most likely come up at another time; and then we will canvass the reasons on which the recommendation of the committee is based.

I have not now the time to give the reasons which operated upon the mind of the committee in recommending the surrender of New London. I will only call attention to the recommendation of a committee upon the part of the Senate during the second session of the Forty-third Congress, of which committee Senator SARGENT of California was chairman, and which recommended the abolition of the navy-yard at New London.

I pass now to the remaining suggestion of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the recommendation for the re-organization of the Marine Corps. I have time only to state briefly that the proposition is to reduce the number of privates in that corps from fifteen hundred to twelve hundred and the number of officers to sixty-six, being nine less than the number recommended by the Committee on Appropriations. We also recommend the abolition of the staff in that corps. In this connection we recommend such measures as will, in the judgment of the committee, be promotive of efficiency in that corps as well as economy in the general service.

Having thus hastily called attention to the recommendations of the committee, I take occasion to say that at the proper time these propositions will be submitted as amendments to the pending bill and the concurrence of the House asked for them.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, it affords me pleasure to bring to the attention of the House a measure of retrenchment which, while it proposes a large reduction, comes here with the indorsement of the entire Committee on Appropriations. It is only due to the Secretary of the Navy for me to state that in our conferences with him upon this bill and the reductions therein proposed he has entered no protest. He has yielded to us all the sources of information freely and fully. There has been no attempt to oppose us in our purposes, but we have been uniformly met with the statement: "This is your Navy; make such appropriations as you may deem fit; it is only my province to conduct the duties of my Department."

Sir, I have no fear that in these reductions the public service will be at all injured. In the first place I do not consider that the continued keeping up of the Navy of the United States at a high state is at all consistent with the genius of our people any more than to maintain a large standing army.

It is our great good fortune that, unlike the great powers of Europe, which are continually meditating destruction of each other both upon land and upon sea, we are isolated, disconnected with those controversies which are continually and as it would seem necessarily arising there. While this Government has been in existence but a hundred years our Navy has been called upon but once worthy of mention to go out against a foreign foe, and that was during the war of 1812. I know we have had other troubles, but they amounted to naught.

It was charged against the administration of Jefferson as well as against the administration of Madison that they had almost wholly neglected the Navy. What was the result? When the trial of strength did come, although we encountered an enemy who, by reason of the blows she had given to the Spanish, French, and Dutch navies, was riding the ocean with contempt for the rest of the world, who does not remember with pride our struggle, and that it was our own despised little Navy which first brought her to a recognition of the fact that there was one power she must and should respect? But how did it happen? Much was due to the fact that our Navy was composed of men of skill, of courage, and of endurance, and a great deal that we found our commercial marine ready at once to come to our rescue. It was our hidden but our easily available strength. The alarm sounded on every occasion when an effort is made to enlarge our Navy is not justified from our own experience. The moral force of reason does not justify it and the great aid of diplomacy does not justify it. If I entertained a doubt on this point, the fact that on my own committee are gentlemen of long experience, who have been here for many years, who, without regard to party, concur in this report, and the further fact that a high Cabinet officer at the head of the Department fails to enter any protest are sufficient reasons why I should not hesitate to go forward.

In addition to this, who does not feel the paralysis of the industries of our land? Tell me a State in any section of this country, in New England, the Middle States, the Southern or Western States, or upon the great Pacific slope, tell me any of them whose Representatives upon this floor will not testify to the fact that labor with them is in enforced idleness; that business of every kind, manufacturing, mercantile, or agriculture, refuses to yield those profits which we found in the days of our peace and prosperity? If this be true, if this is the popular demand, if this is the feeling of the committee, if this is the feeling of Cabinet officers, the country, I say, is to be congratulated that here there is to be retrenchment to which there can be no reasonable objection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these preliminary remarks, it is but due to the House that I should briefly call attention to the reduction in the Navy appropriation bill we have brought forward, and to give some of the reasons which induced the committee to report it.

I will add, however, that the appropriations under this bill as reported amounted to $12,808,655.40; and the appropriations for the last year, or rather for the current fiscal year, were $17,011,306.90, showing a reduction on the appropriations for the last year, or the current fiscal year, of $4,202,651.50; to which may be added, if the statement of the Fourth Auditor be correct, that the pay of the Navy fund has heretofore been sufficient by reason of unexpended balances of previous years not covered back into the Treasury, but which balances are now exhausted, and upon which now there can be no reliance; to which may be added, if that statement be correct, another million of dollars, making a reduction in the expenditures of the Navy Department for the current fiscal year of $5,202,651.50. The estimates for the next fiscal year were $20,871,666.40; and deducting from that the appropriation contained in this bill we have a difference between the estimates and the amount actually appropriated of $8,063,011.

I shall take up the discussion of this bill by paragraphs in the order in which they appear in print. First I am brought by that arrangement to the pay of the Navy. The estimates were $7,600,000, and the appropriation in the bill is $6,250,000. I think I shall be able to show to the satisfaction of the House that that reduction is not sufficient, and I shall therefore at the proper time introduce an amendment reducing it still further. I will here call attention to the following tables of the years 1857, 1859, and 1860, and 1873, 1874, and 1875, showing the estimates of appropriations and expenditures for the naval service for those years:

I have selected the years 1857, 1859, and 1860, because it has been so common on this floor to charge that the administration of Mr. Buchanan was an exceedingly extravagant one. I do not propose to raise the question whether it was or was not. I am not here to defend any administration, but I take these years for the purpose of comparison with the years 1873, 1874, and 1875.

I will now call the attention of the House to the fact that in the year 1859, when the number of men in the Navy was the same as it is at this time, the pay of the Navy was $4,536,707.32. The estimate of the Department for the same number of officers and men for the next fiscal year is $7,600,000. The difference is a very marked one. Members can at their own leisure compare the tables for those several years, and they will find a difference of several millions of dollars in this matter of the pay of the Navy.

I shall ask, Mr. Chairman, in this connection to publish a statement made and handed to me by the Secretary of the Navy, in which he shows or claims that his estimate for 1877 is absolutely correct, and from which it appears that less than $2,000,000 of that sum are paid to the seamen and petty officers; showing that a very large proportion of it, nearly $5,000,000, goes to the retired-list and to the pay of the officers.

The statement as furnished by the Secretary of the Navy is as follows:

Why, Mr. Chairman, is there this difference between the years preceding the war and the present time? Permit me to state here, however, that there are three grades of service in the Navy: sea service, shore service, and waiting orders. An examination of the table furnished me by the Secretary of the Navy will show that not one-tenth of the officers on the pay-roll are on waiting orders or furlough, the rest being on sea and shore duty.

The statement of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] as to the small number of vessels in the service is one well worthy our attention in this connection. The Revised Statutes expressly provide that in addition to this pay the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, furlough officers and further reduce their pay. Before the war it was exceedingly common to put the best officers in the service on furlough. Gradually there was a disposition to depart from it. Officers were put upon waiting orders where they could have nothing else to do, until now it seems it has grown up, notwithstanding the laws of the land, to that point where officers feel it an indignity to put them on furlough pay. There is no question in my mind in addition to that but what there are a great number of officers who are on shore duty and that that duty is almost absolutely nothing.

The only correction that can be made in this matter is by the appropriation bill itself. I make no charge against any Administration or against any Cabinet officer. I can understand that these importunities will come upon any officer that may happen to be at the head of the Department, and come from gentlemen of courage, of learning, of honor, and come with power. The Representatives of the people have it in their power to check this abuse, and they ought by all means to do it. And with this view, and being thoroughly aware that I am correct in the statement I am making, I shall offer an amendment hereafter for a further reduction of this appropriation.

Again, sir, I feel it my duty in passing to call the attention of the House to a note in the estimates by the Fourth Auditor on the subject of the pay of the Navy. In reference to the estimate of the current expenses of the year he says:

> This is the amount made up by close computation and examination of the rolls by both the Fourth Auditor's Office and the Navy Department. The appropriations for the last three years have been too small to make the payments required by the provision of existing laws. The deficit has only been made up by the balances of the appropriations for pay, available by law for this purpose; all these that can be legally used are now exhausted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this statement cannot be true. In 1873, when the number of the Navy was eighty-five hundred men, the appropriations were $6,315,000, while the expenditures were $6,432,882, being in excess of the appropriation. In 1874 the appropriations were $6,316,000, and the expenditures were $7,633,000. It will be remembered that was the year in which the Secretary of the Navy enlisted some fifteen hundred additional men when we were apprehending trouble with Spain. In 1875 the appropriations were $6,285,000, and the expenditures $6,511,000.

It will be observed therefore, Mr. Chairman, that every year the expenditures have exceeded the appropriations. But while in practice they may have relied upon the fund here referred to, with the single exception of 1874, they never have reached in the expenditures of the Department the amount here claimed. Now, there has been an effort on the part of the Fourth Auditor to make an explanation of this based on the fact that officers and men were off on duty and did not get home in time to get their pay during the fiscal year. But when we take it year by year and strike the average, we shall find that this point was never reached except in a single instance when we were apprehending trouble abroad and enlisted an additional number of men. It is not my purpose, sir, to say how this statement happens to come from the Fourth Auditor. It seems to me, sir, to say the least, that it shows that the accounts in that Office are not perfectly kept. I would not say, it would be unkind to say, that there was purposely a false statement.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Is it not the fact that all this matter of the adjustment of the pay of the officers and men of the Navy is in the Fourth Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department and not in the Navy Department?

Mr. BLOUNT. That is true. I did not charge that this came from the Navy Department at all.

The next subject to which I shall call the attention of the House of any importance—for I shall not go into the numerous details of reductions and shall only take up prominent heads and give reasons for the larger reductions—is in reference to the Bureau of Ordnance.

In that Bureau, sir, we have reduced the amount about one-half. We can do so because too much has already been spent and there is no reason why we may not reduce largely the expenditures in this branch. In the next place we propose to at least suspend work in a large number of the navy-yards, and many of the expenditures under this item growing out of the fact of the large number of navy-yards now in operation. In addition to that, the reduction of the number of men in the Navy to one thousand and the consequent reduction of our cruising vessels will justify the decrease.

Now, sir, when we shall reach the details of this bill I will then at the proper time give in detail the reason, which will probably be more satisfactory to the House. In reference to the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, we have been able to reduce the sum from $1,250,000 to $1,000,000. The reduction of men and the consequent reduction of the number of cruising vessels authorize the demand of this Bureau. One of the large items involved here is the purchase of coal. The committee have thought that there might easily be a reduction here by reason of the withdrawal of the cruising vessels and the reduction of men in the service, and that there might be a further reduction of the item of coal, as the vessels in our Navy are all full-rigged, are all sailing-vessels if need be, and could by economy do with less coal.

Further the reduction is not a large one, only $250,000 from the appropriation of last year. The appropriation of last year exceeded that of the year before. The expenditures in all of these Bureaus are limited to the amount of money Congress may see fit to give. The more we give the more we are called upon to give. In the Bureau of Yards and Docks we have reduced the appropriation from $860,000 to $440,000. Here, again, comes the matter of the reduction of the navy-yards and of the expenditures in them. They have been reduced more than one-half. That is the theory of the bill, and the general reduction in the Navy will authorize and justify what we have done in the premises. In reference to the Bureau of Clothing and Provisions, we have reduced the amount of the appropriation from $1,279,000 to $93,000. And the general reasons which I have given in reference to the other Bureaus apply also to this Bureau.

Coming on, sir, to the Bureau of Construction and Repairs, the committee have reduced the appropriation on that item to $1,500,000. I will here call attention to several reports of the Navy Department, showing that for several years since the war a large amount of repairs were made, and especially during the year of 1874.

A great many of our monitors repaired. The wood work in them was substituted by iron.

Report dated November 29, 1873: Thirteen vessels sold. Six live-oak cruising vessels repaired. Eight new sloops-of-war authorized by the Forty-second Congress in process of building. Repairing of iron-clads continued.

In conclusion, I am glad to be able to report the fighting-force of our Navy in good and effective condition. During the last two years the whole fleet of our single-turreted monitors has been thoroughly overhauled and repaired, their sides raised up, their rotten wooden beams and decks replaced by iron, and their turrets and machinery put in complete order, so that they are now efficient to their utmost capacity, and ready to go to sea at any time as soon as crews can be put on board and organized. These, with the Dictator and Roanoke, also in good order, make a fleet of sixteen iron-clads, powerful for any naval purpose which does not require long voyages or great speed. Two powerful iron torpedo-vessels have also been completed, and are ready for service, fully equipped with this most powerful weapon of modern warfare. Four of our powerful double-turreted monitors, namely, the Terror, the Miantonomah, the Monadnock, and the Amphitrite, (by far the most formidable vessels ever in our Navy,) are also now in hand undergoing repairs, and the plans are also being matured for the repair of the Puritan, the only one of our efficient iron-clads which remains untouched. The eight new sloops specially authorized, and built entirely of live-oak or iron, are about ready to be added to our cruising navy, and seven other of our vessels have been or are being thoroughly repaired with like durable material and supplied with new and improved machinery, so as to be in all respects equal to new ships of their class. We shall thus have added, by the end of the year, fifteen new and active ships to our cruising navy, to take the places of those vessels which are worn out and must be relieved. Most of our powerful wooden ships of the first class were also put in condition at the time of our threatened difficulties of last year, and are now in commission or in ordinary, ready for immediate service when needed. Thus all that there is of our Navy either is or will shortly be in the best state possible for vessels of their respective classes, and all will be, and will continue to be effective for service, except those of our cruisers which, built hastily of green white-oak, are now rapidly reaching the limits of their sea-life, and are one by one falling out of the line of active duty, to be laid up or sold as unfit for further service.

Warned by the rapid decay of our white-oak ships, the Department has required that all new wooden ships should be built and all our expensive repairs made of live-oak, and has, for this purpose and for the future necessities of the service, secured and accumulated a large quantity of this almost invaluable but rapidly disappearing material in the various navy-yards, where it will be properly cared for and seasoned, for use as occasion may require.

This statement certainly shows our Navy to-day in a better condition of effective and permanent strength than it has been for years; and when we understand that three years ago none of our now efficient iron-clads, except the Dictator and the Terror, were fit for any service whatever, and that during that time we have, in addition to putting them in repair, practically built fifteen live-oak cruising ships, and carried on also the necessary repairs to maintain the Navy afloat, and that at that time there was scarcely a stick of live-oak timber in the Government yards, where now is gathered an adequate supply of this most valuable and improving material; and when we remember that it has been possible, under the direction of our skilled and practical officers, so to utilize the liberality of Congress that this has been accomplished out of the comparatively small portion of the naval appropriations which it is possible to devote to the actual building and equipment of ships, we are justified in feeling some pride in the prospect that the American Navy will be able in the future, as in the past, to contribute its fair proportion to the strength, resources, and dignity of a powerful though peaceful nation.

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT.

Secretary Welles on page 41 of the date of December 1, 1866, says the force in the navy-yards has been principally employed in placing in efficient condition vessels which had been almost constantly used during the war.

On page 25 of his report of December, 1866, he says fourteen ships are in course of construction in the several navy-yards; four of them iron-clads with turrets. On page 38 of same report he says $7,976,192 paid for labor and superintendence in navy-yards.

In report of 1867 and 1868: Four vessels launched during the year. The steam machinery for seven more such vessels is completed. Four smaller vessels in process of construction, and the machinery completed.

In report for 1868 and 1869 the Secretary says two iron-clads were sold and others recommended to be sold because they deteriorate.

A commission, with Admiral Goldsborough at its head, to examine steam machinery, on page 143 shows many vessels built during the war and a vast amount of repairing done in 1868, 1869, and 1870.

December 1, 1869, Secretary Robeson claimed that the Navy was out of repair, (see page 6 of 1869 and 1870;) that by reason of steam-vessels being full-rigged with sails a saving in coal of $2,000,000 could be effected.

It will be remembered that during the year 1874 we were apprehensive of trouble with Spain, and not only new vessels were provided, but others were repaired under the prompt and proper action on the part of the Administration to put it in condition for active service. The whole Navy underwent repair.

The Secretary of the Navy in his last report says that the Navy is in finer condition than it ever has been. The officer at the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair says that one hundred and two vessels have been repaired during the year. Here is his list of vessels repaired:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
November 17, 1875.

The committee, therefore, have thought that this is a time when we could retrench in the matter of construction and repair, and while I am not authorized to state that the Secretary of the Navy indorses this measure, I do say that he says there never was a time in the history of the American Navy when there could be a reduction in this Bureau so well as now.

In reference to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, the committee have seen it proper to leave it intact. They have been struck at the great difference in the pay of professors and officers of that institution and the pay of similar officers at the institution at West Point. Having just passed through the consideration of the Military Academy bill and considered it in detail, when we came to the modest appropriation asked for by the Naval Academy we could see no place where any retrenchment could be had.

In reference to the Marine Corps we propose a reduction. The present number of officers is ninety-three, and we propose a gradual reduction down to seventy-five.

There have been several bills introduced by the Committee on Naval Affairs as amendments to this bill which I do not care at this time to discuss. I have no authority from the Committee on Appropriations either to accept or reject them. At the proper time they will have what consideration the House may see fit to give them.

Before concluding, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reference to our navy-yards. We have at this time nine navy-yards. We have appropriated under the heading of the Bureau of Construction and Repairs one million and a half of dollars. How absurd it is, sir, to think that we are keeping up nine navy-yards in this country with all of their bureaus, which have grown up during the war, with their civil lists, with their expenses, and with almost infinite details, simply for the purpose of doing the little repairing that is now proposed. The committee have not seen fit to ask now for the sale of these several yards. It is a grave question, and one worthy of consideration, whether or not we had best sell them or simply close them and keep them for time of peril, and they have therefore gone no further than simply to direct the Secretary of the Navy to suspend many of them and to report upon the matter and manner of their sale.

We have gone one step further in reference to the yard at New London and have absolutely directed that measures should be taken for its retrocession. In connection with several of these yards, the one at Washington, the one at New London, and the one at Philadelphia, I shall insert a report of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, who had this matter of reduction of navy-yards under consideration, and the comments of which I think are sufficient to satisfy every member of the House, and which I accept and adopt as my own:

LEAGUE ISLAND, PHILADELPHIA, AND WASHINGTON NAVY-YARDS.

These navy-yards should be concentrated at League Island. Congress provided by act of February 18, 1867, "that if League Island be selected, the navy-yard at Philadelphia shall be dispensed with and disposed of by the United States as soon as the public convenience will admit." Subsequent legislation has provided for the partial removal of articles from the Philadelphia yard. The sooner the whole transfer is completed and that yard closed up the better. The navy-yard at Philadelphia has less area than any other, less than twenty-two acres, entirely too small for the purposes of the Government, is much exposed to fire, and its site would sell for several millions of money. The location of the yard has retarded the growth of the city in that direction, the undeveloped water-front below having long been needed for commercial purposes, as well as the site of the yard itself, which now operates as an effectual barrier to the necessary communication with the wharves below. These considerations would not be conclusive if the interests of the Government absolutely required the place for a navy-yard, for local must give way to general good. But League Island is a better place for a navy-yard, and is now partially improved as such, as we shall show. But these facts account for the great rise in value of the old site commercially, and guarantee that it will sell for a sum that will duplicate all its facilities at League Island in a permanent and substantial manner, even at a forced sale. It is an absurdity to prolong a state of things by which two navy-yards are maintained within three miles of each other; and the Government should hasten the work at League Island, so as to abolish the Philadelphia yard, stop expense of repairs at the latter point, and realize for the Treasury the proceeds from the sale of its valuable site. The buildings at the Philadelphia yard are forty-two in number, of which twenty-two are wood, and the repairs are estimated at $70,000. Its streets are narrow and tortuous, and the transportation of timber and heavy articles through them is extremely difficult. It has but eight hundred and twenty feet water-front measured on the port warden's line, and of this front more than one-half (four hundred and forty feet) is taken up with the floating sectional dry-dock, its deep berth and shallow basin, and the openings for the launching-ways of the ship-houses. There is but one pier. The buildings are crowded in together, with little regard to plan, and the work at the yard is hindered and made expensive by confusion resulting from confined space and other inconveniences. To put the dry-dock in order will cost $119,000. The tools and machinery are valuable, and will be available for the plant of the League Island yard.

The Washington navy-yard has too small an area for an extensive establishment, and has of late years been used rather for a repairing and manufacturing yard than for building. The approach to it is by a crooked and difficult channel; it is far from the sea; is remote from supplies of timber, iron, and coal; the number of skilled artisans is limited; and there is no work done at it that cannot be more cheaply done and the materials more cheaply obtained at League Island, when that yard is put in proper condition to do it. The Washington navy-yard is well supplied with good buildings, tools, and machinery, and in a better locality for its purposes would be of great value. The estimate for repairs of buildings is about $19,000.

League Island has many striking advantages as a site for a navy-yard. It is inaccessible to a hostile fleet from the sea, being within the defenses of a great city; a great manufacturing population surrounds it—skillful wood and iron workers, busy in time of peace in the creation and repair of the commercial marine, and furnishing an inexhaustible supply of skilled labor; it is in the midst of a great coal and iron region; it is ample in its area, and has a water-front of great extent and value; and its fresh water is needed to preserve our iron vessels.

NEW LONDON NAVY-YARD.

The site for this navy-yard was conveyed to the Government by the State of Connecticut. It has a water front on the river Thames of one mile, and a mean breadth of six hundred and seventy feet. The map of the Coast Survey shows the channel to be very narrow, and along most of the water front at a very considerable distance from the shore line. The channel is so narrow opposite the navy-yard that an ordinary-sized Government vessel could not swing at anchor with the tide without striking on either side, and vessels like the Franklin, Wabash, Minnesota, Colorado, Tennessee, New York, and the Iowa class, which draw about twenty-one feet, and are about three hundred feet long, some longer, would need to be handled with care to turn them around at the upper end of the yard without striking.

As to the other yards, we propose to act further for the reasons which I have already stated.

In addition, there is a proposition in regard to establishing a naval rendezvous at Tybee, off the coast of Georgia. I call attention to a memorial on that subject setting forth all the advantages of such a rendezvous, and a statement from the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, who, if anybody knows, certainly ought to know whether this is right and proper:

To the honorable the Senators and Representatives from the State of Georgia in the Congress of the United States:

The mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah, and the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade, and Central Railroad and Banking Company, and Atlantic and Gulf Railroad Company, and commissioners of pilotage, of said city, beg leave to call your earnest attention to the plan said to be entertained by the authorities of the General Government for the establishment of a naval station at Port Royal and to lay before you some reasons why said plan is inexpedient and unnecessary, subjecting the Government to large and useless expenditures without commensurate resulting benefits, to the injury of the great local interests represented by your memorialists as well as to the general commercial interests of the people of Georgia, and, without justification, to an increase of burdens of the General Government.

Assuming it to be expedient for the national defense and for the economy of the Navy to establish a naval station at an appropriate point on the South Atlantic coast, it will not be denied that the harbor of Port Royal affords for this purpose an advantage confined to its capacity to float a larger number of vessels than any other harbor on the South Atlantic coast; but this advantage is overcome by other considerations of greater value.

It is claimed for Port Royal harbor that the depth of water carried into it is greater than that of any other harbor on the South Atlantic coast. But this we can deny with confidence, the depth of water over the entrance of Port Royal and Savannah being the same, namely, nineteen feet at mean low tide. In this respect, therefore, no superiority can be asserted for the former, each allowing vessels of the same draught, while there is no other harbor on the South Atlantic coast known to have as deep water over its ocean bar. In a comparison of the inner capacities of the two ports the area of Port Royal is greater than that of Savannah, but the area of the latter is amply sufficient to contain safely and conveniently any fleet the United States are ever likely to concentrate on the South Atlantic coast in times of peace or war, while it is well known that the anchorage of the ports is equally esteemed, whether for holding-ground or protection during storms.

It is therefore evident that the only natural advantage which can be claimed for Port Royal over the port of Savannah is in area, and this advantage is not necessary to be considered in view of the sufficiency of the area of the latter.

We now ask your earnest attention to other points looking to the superiority of the port of Savannah as a naval station in respect to economy and convenience:

First. Port Royal is wholly undefended by fortifications, but the port of Savannah is protected by Fort Pulaski, capable of mounting the heaviest class of modern armament, while the Government holds two hundred and ten acres of land on Tybee Island, intended for the site of additional fortifications to defend the channel still more completely, to bring hostile vessels under concentrated fire, and more effectually cover any shipping seeking protection from an enemy. These defenses have been established by the General Government at great cost, and there can be no good reason assigned why, for the protection of a naval station, the Government should expend large sums of money at Port Royal when all the protection needed for a naval station already exists or may be economically added to that already established in the harbor of Savannah. In short, Port Royal would require the erection of new costly works, already constructed at Savannah, and the Government be subjected to useless and unjustifiable expense.

It has been said that it is not the purpose of the Government authorities to erect permanent fortifications in Port Royal harbor, and that the foregoing suggestions are not well founded; but with what expediency and economy could a station for the South Atlantic fleet be established at any given point without surrounding it with adequate means of protection in times of war?

If it is to be believed that iron-clad vessels will afford sufficient protection to such a station, either such vessels must be so constructed as to take the place of permanent land defenses and cost commensurate sums of money, or, if otherwise, such vessels must be confined to that one position and become unavailable when required at other points. The Government must be subjected to greater expense in either case: in the one to provide new stationary and in the other to increase the number of maneuvering vessels.

Second. The Government already owns ample available land accommodations in Savannah harbor for the purposes of a naval station, namely, the whole of Cockspur Island, on which Fort Pulaski rests, and two hundred and ten acres of land on Tybee Island, facing the anchorage and available for workshops, coal depots, storehouses, &c.

Third. Port Royal is little more than a natural harbor; it does not possess any important commercial establishment. While, therefore, it should not present any important local reasons for naval defense, it offers no advantage as a point of local supply for any portion of the Navy of the United States. Nor does it contain any of the facilities necessary as a place of naval resort. It has neither workshops nor docks. All these must be erected at the cost of the Government, even for temporary purposes of the most unimportant character. On the contrary, the city of Savannah does possess an extensive commercial establishment, with all its essential appliances. Its exports are the greatest in value on the South Atlantic coast—one-third in value of those of the Atlantic and Gulf ports, employing in 1875 shipping carrying 1,061,000 tons and manned by 30,600 seamen. Its imports are large in value, paying a revenue into the Government Treasury since the close of the war, in the shape of custom-house duties, of $2,396,484. Its several railway communications leading from every portion of the Union, and its marine, concentrating from all civilized countries, bring every species of supplies demanded by a large local population and by extensive external commerce. It has workshops on a large scale. Its marine railway and dry-dock are capable of larger accommodations for the repairs of vessels than those of any port on the South Atlantic and are sufficient to receive an ordinary man-of-war. In addition to these advantages for affording general supplies and naval facilities, no American harbor excels that of Savannah in the character of the water fitted for naval use. Vessels are supplied directly from the Savannah River with water of the most wholesome kind and the least capable of putrescence, while it affords the best possible remedy against the destructiveness of the ship-worm. On the contrary, Port Royal harbor has no such facilities; drinking-water can be obtained there only from springs and wells with difficulty and expense, while it is of doubtful durability on the voyage.

Fourth. But while we venture to lay these pregnant facts before you as combining sufficient reasons why a naval station should not be established at Port Royal, and because the Government will thereby be subject to causeless and unjustifiable expenditures, we beg leave to add that, in our apprehension, such outlays will necessarily result in the establishment of a growing commerce at that point, to the serious and lasting detriment of the commerce of the city of Savannah and other parts of the State of Georgia. It should not be lost sight of that this city, in her corporate capacity, has expended from her treasury at least one-quarter of a million of dollars in the improvement of the navigation of the river, from which the Government has derived a large amount of revenue, cited above in the import duties paid by vessels profiting by the deepening of the river channel, and that Congress, recognizing the wisdom of our efforts, has in the past three years assumed the work of improvements, in order to perfect what Savannah, by her own unaided efforts, had incepted.

These advantages, with all the facilities and accommodations they contain, have been developed during a long period of industry and enterprise and at a vast outlay of public and private capital, from which the General Government itself has drawn large revenues; and we do most solemnly urge that the General Government should not, without such forcible reasons as cannot be made apparent in this case, seek to create a great public establishment, to be paid for in part from revenue derived from the people of Savannah and other ports and the people of the State of Georgia, and to threaten permanent and vital injury to their most valuable interests.

We do therefore respectfully ask the grave attention of our honorable Senators and Representatives to this important subject, invoking their just protection for the great interests we have the honor to represent, and which we believe to be endangered by impending plans looking not so carefully to the establishment of a naval station at Port Royal as to the creation of a new commercial port at the expense of the General Government and to the irremediable detriment of vested interests existing elsewhere.

SAVANNAH, February 4, 1876.

[Indorsement on the foregoing by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, to whom the above was referred by the Secretary of the Navy for a report.]

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 7, 1876.

[Relating to and accompanying memorial of the city of Savannah to Congress, setting forth the advantages of their waters for a naval station, referred to this Bureau by the Navy Department.]

The points are fairly presented in the memorial, and in comparison with the harbor of Port Royal.

First. The depth of water on the Savannah River bar is sufficient.

Second. The anchorage off Tybee Island and within the bar is ample in extent and is salubrious at all seasons.

Third. Pure fresh water is found at all seasons of the year at the head of Elba Island, or at a distance of about ten miles from the entrance of the river, and several miles lower down during a considerable part of the year. This would not only be of great advantage and economy for drinking supply, but also in preventing rust and the accumulation of barnacles and other animal and vegetable growths on the bottoms of iron vessels. This condition is of marked contrast to Port Royal. The fresh-water bills of the Dictator for six months amount to $4,584.18, at the rate of $9,168.36 yearly. With the force now making rendezvous at Port Royal, the cost for drinking-water will be not less than $100,000 yearly. The vegetable and animal growth in Port Royal harbor on the bottoms of iron vessels is surprisingly great.

Fourth. The sufficiency of fortifications of the Savannah River, and the insufficiency, or rather absence, of them at Port Royal.

Fifth. The facilities of obtaining repairs and supplies of all kinds at reasonable rates and, if desired, directly from the North by steamers.

Sixth. The facility of hauling up or putting vessels into dry-dock, for repairs, and of sufficient capacity for all classes of vessels usual in those waters and at no greater cost than at northern ports.

Seventh. Should the yellow fever become epidemic at Savannah or in those waters, which is of rare occurrence, the proximity to Port Royal, Warsaw, and other sounds and ports less frequented, to which naval vessels could go.

Eighth. The proximity of an agreeable cultivated society, a preventive of low dissipation to the personnel, though affording necessary recreation and maintaining the morale, so necessary to effectiveness.

Ninth. Should the War Department allow the use of the wharf on Cockspur Island and the erection of sheds for coal and other supplies, and, if found convenient, to temporarily turn over Fort Pulaski to the Navy, with sheds, storehouses, &c., the supplies of coal, provisions, and other stores would be far safer from depredation or injury than would be the case at Port Royal without a considerable expenditure, and they would be landed and taken on board at small cost and with great facility.

For a depot of supplies, as above shown, the waters of Savannah River have special advantages. A personal knowledge of the localities mentioned enables me to give an expression of opinion such as would not be possible otherwise.

Respectfully submitted, March 8, 1876.

DANIEL AMMEN,
Chief of Bureau of Navigation.

[Unofficial.]

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION, NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 17, 1876.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request I have to state that the anchorage at Tybee Roads is regarded by all seamen as perfectly safe, and that it would be rough only when the wind set squarely in, and not across the broad flats at the entrance.

All vessels drawing sixteen or eighteen feet could on the first high tide go up beyond Cockspur Island where the water would be smooth, and could do so at low water, when the wind set squarely in, owing to the banking effects of the winds.

Referring to the comparison asked, I would say that Port Royal Harbor, low down, where the vessels usually laid, was generally as rough, or rougher than Tybee Roads, and not at all as smooth as above Cockspur Island.

The importance of fresh water for the bottoms of iron vessels is well known, and that it is simply a question of a very short time when the iron bottom lying quietly in salt water in a hot climate, will be actually rusted out or disintegrated.

The very considerable cost of fresh water for drinking purposes that would have to be purchased at Port Royal, would be far less than the cost of iron vessels through deterioration when lying quietly in salt water.

Very respectfully yours,

DANIEL AMMEN,
Chief of Bureau of Navigation.

Hon. J. H. BLOUNT, M. C.

At the present time our vessels are rendezvousing at Port Royal, where there is no fresh water for our iron-clads, no storehouses, and no docks. Some of the iron-clads have been brought from Pensacola for the reason that there is no fresh water at that point. It is urged that Savannah is a proper place for a naval rendezvous, first, because the anchorage there is good and, second, because there is a dry-dock and ship-yard there, with fresh water and communication with New York by land and water. The Government is already in possession of three hundred acres of land on Cockspur Island, quite as much or more land on Tybee Island. On Tybee Island there is every facility for stores, and great numbers of buildings that are now of no use.

There will be no expenditure required by the Government to make that a naval rendezvous. The Secretary of War recommends it, and

I am informed that the Secretary of the Navy thinks it is a proper thing to be done. It will be to the advantage of the Government, in order that the buildings now under the control of the War Department may be utilized for this purpose.

The chief of the Bureau of Navigation states in his communication that in the item of water alone for the vessels at Port Royal the sum of $100,000 has been expended. That shows how improper it was to select that place as a naval rendezvous and how very proper that the provision in reference to Tybee Island should be adopted.

At this late stage of the session and in view of the feeling of members that the business of the country shall be proceeded with instead of our time being taken up in debate, I do not feel at liberty to go further than I have in occupying the time of the House. I will therefore yield the remainder of my time to the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. I will yield the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FREEMAN.] Before he proceeds, allow me to say that the gentleman represents a district in which is located one of these yards; and as he desires to present his views upon the subject, and for the further reason that I am desirous that we shall as soon as possible get to the five-minutes debate upon this bill, I will yield my time to him and not take it myself.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for his courtesy.

It had not been my intention to consume the time of the House upon matters outside of the committee upon which I have the honor of serving, but the importance of the amendment which I understand is to be offered to the bill under consideration, not only to those whom I more immediately represent but to the vital interests of the country at large, has impelled me to feel not merely the inclination but the solemn duty of entering my protest against the principle upon which it claims to be based. I had rather say, sir, want of principle, for I fail to appreciate the patriotism or the statesmanship or even the political sagacity from which it can claim existence. Do gentlemen remember that this is a great nation, destined to become the greatest on the face of the globe, if it shall not be stricken down and its natural future destroyed by ignorance or intentionally insidious legislation? These, sir, are the dangers to be feared, and not the provision of the proper and necessary funds for carrying out the functions of Government. It is a most remarkable picture that we find presents itself, if we look back to the early days of 1861. The party now in power in this House for the first time since those dark days had wielded possession of the Government for many years before. Yet the condition of this branch of service, so vital to the preservation of the nation's life at that time, was worse than pitiable. So little prepared were we for a foreign war that we could not secure, with all the tonnage of the country, an efficient closing of our own ports. It is within the memory of every member of this House that so helpless were we from fatal want of foresight or intentional neglect that two cruisers alone were able to sweep the broad seas of almost every vestige of American commerce.

And I beg to say, sir, to this House that I refer to this past in no spirit wanting in fraternal regard, for I would to God while its experiences must live its memories might be buried from the face of the earth and blotted from every heart. But I do so, nevertheless, to invoke the teachings of its philosophy and to gather forethought from the lessons of its sad experiences. What would have been the result, nay, what must inevitably be the result if by the unforeseen wisdom of Providence we should be engaged this year in a foreign war? Why, sir, Great Britain, France, Italy, and even poor torn Spain could blow the American Navy to atoms. It may not be palatable to American pride, but it is exactly the existing state of facts. And yet to-day the American Navy is in a better condition than it has ever been since we have had a Government. But it has fallen far out of sight of the natural growth and increase of the nation, and a casual comparison of the figures will show how little our wise men have appreciated the corresponding growth of our relations and interests abroad and our dignity among the nations of the world.

Navies are not capable of springing into vitality in a day; and I propose to give a few of the figures to show how important this branch of the service has been considered by every European power. England, with all her magnificent ship-yards costing hundreds of millions already created, expended in the year ending March 31, 1874, £10,244,355; in 1875, £10,678,092; in 1876, £10,825,194; and in 1877 the estimates are for nearly fifty-seven millions of dollars, or nearly 450 per cent. more than the amount appropriated in this bill. These countries have a length of coast not to be mentioned in extent with ours. During the last hundred years the populations have grown but a fractional degree of the extent of our own young land, which has increased, despite its trials and internecine struggle, 1,300 per cent. And, sir, if this is the history of past growth, what is to be expected of the future? Are we to close our eyes to these facts and thoughts in legislating upon a subject of the gravity and importance of the one under consideration? Are we to hack and hew away at this appropriation involving the future welfare and safety of this people with the same disregard of the public necessity and duty as has characterized the legislation on the diplomatic bill or that pertaining to pinched and beggarly clerks?

Sir, I raise my voice against any such ruinous policy. I am opposed to an economy which is to expose us, as in the Virginius affair, without a moment's warning, to the hasty and inconsiderate expenditure of emergency money, which a proper state of national defense would have prevented. Has this nation no dignity? Has it no foreign relations involving high national duties? Is it to go on forgetful in the present of the possible dangers of the future? Are we proof against the passions and dangers which older nations watch with such jealous care? It seems to me far otherwise. Of all countries, this is essentially a maritime one. The ocean is certain to be alive with its commerce. It is but a question of time, and of comparatively approximate time. One long line of coast sweeping the edges of the Atlantic and Pacific and the Gulf of Mexico, will be teeming with busy ports. Give them protection and a feeling of security, such as that accorded by other nations to those sailing beneath their flags. Let us look at this matter in a broad spirit of patriotism, and be not penny-wise and pound-foolish.

Let me say, sir, that by the Constitution authority is granted to the legislating power to establish and maintain a navy, and this involves a duty of a lofty and imperious character. It should be exercised with stability, and should not be subject to the varying impulses of changing and uncertain legislation. All such legislation should be founded upon a scientific regard for the seriousness of the consequences. It should be guided by the intelligence of the best minds, and not be wafted upon the shifting current of vacillating party politics.

The introduction of steam worked of itself a wonderful change in the relations and conditions of maritime nations. Time and the experience of war here in our own land in one year revolutionized the system of war-ships and naval warfare throughout the world. I ask the Clerk to read a passage I have marked in the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1874.

The Clerk read as follows:

A COMPARISON WITH FOREIGN NAVIES.

While we have been satisfied with our iron vessels built during the civil war, many of which proved worthless, the following is the result of the enterprise of foreign nations, who seem to vie with each other in the race of building iron-clads and casting heavy guns.

England has built, and is building, since the introduction of iron-clads, fifty-five vessels of 322,852 tons, iron-clad, armor-plated ships, and iron-plated gun-boats. France has built forty-four iron-cased vessels of all kinds, or 188,375 tons; Russia, twenty-four iron-plated vessels, or 67,000 tons; Italy, twenty-two, or 75,101 tons; Austria, nine, or 36,119 tons; Turkey, four, or 16,884 tons; Spain, eleven, or 42,000 tons; Sweden, five, or 5,100 tons; Denmark, six, or 10,836 tons; Holland, five, or ——— tons; Germany, eleven, or 63,776 tons; one hundred and ninety-six iron clads, all told, to say nothing of Chili and Peru, which have a larger force of these vessels than the combined forces of all the foreign nations on their coasts.

The nation that seems to be advancing most rapidly in naval power is the German Empire, which, from having a very small force of vessels in 1869, has now a very respectable one, and in a few years will possess an iron-clad navy only inferior in size to those of England, France, and Russia.

Mr. FREEMAN. Hence the necessity, only too evident to those whose position and education had best fitted them to judge, for the corresponding revolution in material and conveniences to suit the changed condition of things. And this progress and improvement still necessitate and create additional change. Hence the introduction of iron-clads worked a great modification and alteration in the requirements of such vessels as were laid up either for repairs or in ordinary. They demanded imperatively such water as would act less disastrously upon the iron plates than salt water. It is interesting to mark this era in naval affairs. As early as March 25, 1862, the Secretary of the Navy called attention to this general subject in a communication to the House Committee on Naval Affairs. On June 9 following he said:

It is now generally conceded that vessels for fighting purposes must be heavily plated with iron, if they are not built entirely of that material. In this, as in most costly fabrics, economy is reached through durability. Iron ship-building is new in this country, but few persons are engaged in it, and it is a novelty in our yards. Heavy iron beams, shafting, and thick iron plates can be procured from only two or three parties, and then in limited quantities and subject to great delay. Individuals have little use for iron of such magnitude as the Navy must have, and there must unavoidably be great outlay to prepare for the execution of such work. With only the Navy for a purchaser there can be no competition, and the Government will be compelled under such circumstances to pay almost any price the mills and forges may demand. No inconsiderable portion of an iron ship can be made and procured at the ordinary mills, and so far as it can be done it may be the best policy to be so supplied; but as the heavy and expensive portions cannot be so procured, and unless the Government is prepared to execute the work, it will be subject to imposition and its vessels to marked inferiority.

And it is no less a necessity than a duty that we should legislate for these United States as a great maritime power. The laws of nature have decreed it, and nothing but our own folly can prevent it from becoming so. It is far different, it will be perceived, from the question presented by the Army. Experience has demonstrated, from the wonderful extent of our territory and the physical surroundings of the case, that we need entertain no fear on that score. To defend this country against a foreign foe millions of men could be raised in a week, and the extraordinary development of our manufacturing interests could almost as rapidly equip them.

But, sir, a navy is a work of time. Its growth, to be substantial and well conditioned, must be, relatively, slow. It must be subject to the improvements and changes and advances yearly being made by the great nations, and required by the advancing spirit of the times, and the growing wants of the country. For my part I am opposed to the abandonment of any of our navy-yards. Should such a course be adopted, in my opinion the time will come when it will be deeply regretted. I can see no logic in the proposition to wait until a city is burned down to build the necessary fire-extinguishing apparatus, and I can see no radical difference between the cases.

The whole object and reasoning and necessities which led the Government to establish League Island were to supply an imperative national want. It was not done or intended as an additional yard, and it is not one in fact. It is one of a different character only, and has been established with the purpose of meeting the requirements of the changed condition of naval affairs and the needs of an iron navy. The Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report of December 1, 1862, says upon this subject:

In selecting a site for such a navy-yard, there are two essential and controlling considerations which must govern. One is the very great advantage (if not absolute necessity) of fresh water over salt water for the preservation of iron vessels. The other is security from an attack by a foreign enemy. These two primary qualities are to be had at League Island. Iron and coal are also in close proximity to that location.

In regard to the location of naval depots, and the necessity for having them secure from foreign enemies, I cannot more clearly present what are the requisites than by quoting from the report of a very able board of eminent officers and engineers on the sea-coast defenses, made in 1820, as found in Naval Library, volume 13, page 4, as follows:

Security against an attack by sea or land is undoubtedly the first condition required; for the destruction of an establishment of this nature involves with it the destruction of all those elements of a naval force which have been collected a long time beforehand and during peace, to the incalculable loss of the public. Such a misfortune must be severely felt during the whole course of a war, and cannot well be repaired while it continues. This indispensable quality (security) must be obtained, as well as localities will admit, without having recourse to artificial fortifications, for these must be very costly; and if that expense can be avoided, the same sums will be much more advantageously laid out in improving and aggrandizing the establishment of the depot. Thus, if equal in other respects, a place whose site is naturally strong and whose position with respect to the general frontier is well covered should be preferred to another that requires to be fortified.

The great essential here specified of security from attack by a foreign enemy appertains to League Island, which has in that respect strong topographical advantages. Its interior location might have constituted an objection at a former period when only sailing-vessels were in the naval service, but the introduction of steam has wrought a revolution in this respect, rendering the movements of our war vessels independent of wind and tide. Immediate contiguity to the ocean is no longer deemed an advantage, but a disadvantage. Steam, rifled cannon, and modern improvement in ordnance have rendered harbors and depots immediately on the seaboard insecure. In a recent debate in the British Parliament it was emphatically urged that Portsmouth and its immense and costly works must be abandoned, for the reason that a naval depot should not be within the range of five or six miles of an attacking force. If, then, fresh water be indispensable for a navy-yard for the construction, repair, and dockage of iron vessels and vessels that are clad with iron, there is no position east of the Delaware where the difficulties from ice do not exceed those urged against League Island, nor has any place been proposed that presents equal advantages or is so secure from an attack. While there are some obvious and admitted objections to League Island, no place has been proposed that combines so many advantages, unless it be the contracted and altogether inadequate yard at Philadelphia. That yard may perhaps be extended so as to double its present capacity, but, besides involving a large expenditure, it would be then insufficient for our future iron navy.

So also, in the same document:

There is no doubt that for the purpose of a navy-yard and establishment for an iron navy and its wants the banks of the Delaware present advantages that are not to be found elsewhere in the United States.

So also, long after the bitter experience of war practically illustrated the destitute condition of a country like ours without the proper facilities for building an iron vessel, in reply to a resolution of this House of Representatives, under date of May 9, 1864, the Secretary of the Navy says:

I have felt it my duty on repeated occasions to call the attention of Congress to the necessities for a yard and establishment where iron and armored vessels could be constructed for the Government, but the preliminary steps for such an establishment have not yet been taken. In the mean time the Department and the Government are wholly dependent on contractors, who, if they have the will, do not possess the ability to furnish these vessels promptly. Conflicting local controversies in regard to the place which shall be selected and benefited by the proposed important national establishment for an iron navy, such as the present and future necessities of the Government require, have contributed to delay action on this important subject. Having in view economy, as well as the public necessities, I have at no time recommended that the number of our navy-yards should be increased on the Atlantic coast, but it is my deliberate opinion that no time should be wasted in establishing at a proper place a suitable yard where iron vessels can be made and repaired. We feel its necessity in the emergency which has called forth the present inquiry, and not a single contractor is able to meet his engagement even for one of this class of small vessels. In the event of a foreign war with one or more of the principal maritime powers, our position would be most unfortunate, with no Government establishment for the construction or repair of armed vessels such as modern science and skill are introducing.

Such, sir, were the controlling reasons which led the authorities to establish the naval depot at League Island. Strong and unanswerable as they were then, they are stronger far to-day. They appeal with redoubled force against the influence of any conflicting local prejudices, to the patriotism of men who love their country and take a proper pride in the future glory of free Government. I have already said I speak from no sentiment of local pride in this matter, but from an abiding sense of my duty to the whole country. Philadelphia in this, as throughout her past history, has shown her disinterested devotion to the welfare of the entire country. When the question of iron vessels and a fresh-water station for iron vessels was originally suggested by the sufferings and the wants of the nation, the head of the Department wrote to the mayor of Philadelphia to know if League Island could be obtained. Philadelphia came nobly forward and offered to purchase and present to the Government this site, if it were deemed suitable and proper for the purpose. After exhaustive examination it was so deemed; and Philadelphia accordingly purchased and presented the site to the United States in fee. She has since laid out largely of her public money in improving and developing the means of access, and, save as she loves the welfare of the nation, she has no other interest in it. It surely is not necessary for me to dwell on that.

Only a few days ago every member of this body had visible evidence of the generous, loyal spirit actuating her noble people. They have given without stint, both city and State, to celebrate the anniversary of—not their birth, not their vanity or their glory—but of the sealing anew and the consecration of the pledge of free government for a free people throughout the wide borders of the world. The proposition which is made to abolish League Island I trust, therefore, I may be permitted to oppose without being charged with any selfish sentiments of local interest. Why, sir, in December, 1864, the Secretary of the Navy again iterates and reiterates his views in this behalf. He says, alluding once more to this matter and impressed with the vast importance of it:

An extensive water frontage must also be secured. For such a depot and establishment, where costly machinery and material would accumulate during years of peace, the advantages of an interior location are most manifest. These favorable conditions are to be obtained nowhere else so completely as on the Delaware River; and the position of League Island, within the limits of the city of Philadelphia, presents probably a stronger combination of the points that are necessary than any other location.

And this, sir, was a gentleman from near New London, the only other place offering to assist the Government. He had gone through the fiery trials of actual experience, and knew what it was in the day of carnage to hear calls for that which it was impossible to supply. He knew the desperation of the situation and the imperative duty due to the future. He says again—and who can say it may not be with prophetic words?—

Our next contest may be with a naval power which will attempt to direct upon our shores a course of operations similar to those which we have applied to the southern coast for suppressing the rebellion. One yard at least where iron vessels, iron armor, and iron shafting can be manufactured is now imperatively necessary. Among the considerations that should control the selection of a site for such a yard and establishment, which shall become the depot for the materials collected in years of peace with which to build and repair our naval vessels, and where will be aggregated machinery and tools such as at present are not be found in this country, and which, when once procured, could not if destroyed be easily or readily replaced, will be its absolute safety from attack by sea or land. So far as is possible we should avail ourselves of natural advantages in obtaining the indispensable security for such an establishment, without depending entirely on fortifications and artificial means, which would be more costly than the navy-yard itself.

I have heard the argument suggested that it will cost largely to complete League Island, and therefore this rash measure of destruction is commendable. This, I beg to say, is a non sequitur, and is just no argument at all. Was there ever anything more absurd? Is it within the range of human reason to suggest an illustration of greater want of knowledge in the whole history of nations than such a proposition? Why, sir, what are the duties of the Government and for what the exercise of the proper functions of power if not to provide itself for a day of war and for the time of trial? If we are ever to maintain our power and dignity among the nations of the earth, it must be by our flag upon the ocean.

The combined navy-yards and stations of the United States are to-day far more than equaled by single establishments of France and England. The latter nation has expended on Portsmouth alone over $50,000,000 for additional fortifications, rendered necessary by its proximity to the sea and the improvements of modern ordnance developed by the American civil war.

I propose to give a few figures to illustrate the relationship of our Navy now, as far as regards the appropriations therefor in this bill, in comparison with those made say from 1853 to 1860, when the party represented by the gentlemen on the other side of this House had full control of the Government. Then we were in possession of duly-organized naval establishments fitted for the then order of things. Iron vessels had nowhere been heard of in the history of the world, and no one had ever dreamed of the necessities which have arisen since 1861. The following are the amounts appropriated for the support of the Navy for the eight years preceding the war:

1854	13,694,353 37
1855	11,458,610 65
1856	15,701,968 49
1857	14,117,657 03
1858	13,109,357 36
1859	15,580,991 99
Total	111,894,622 81

The appropriations for five of these years far exceed the amount proposed in this bill, and the reasons given then are the ones which are sound to-day. Changes were being made to conform to the introduction of steam, and funds were needed then as they are now to suit the progressive spirit of the times. And such should always be the aim of a wise legislation as tending to true economy and public safety. And yet what does the record show. The Secretary of the Navy, in his report for 1862, says:

From mistaken economy or from design the Government was, in its need, deficient in ships and destitute of material for their construction. No alternative was left when resistance was made but for the Department to build its vessels as speedily as possible and of such timber as could, in the greate haste and emergency, be procured. As a consequence vessels that should have lasted for years will soon perish, and must in the mean time involve heavy expense in necessary repairs in order to keep them afloat.

Is it the intention of this House to have this nation once more encounter such a possible contingency? Even Germany, recognizing the great necessity, has appropriated $72,000,000 for naval purposes since the Franco-German war. Her voice in the councils of Europe will be increased thereby, and add to the probability or possibility, after the unsettled condition on the continent has passed away, of the inauguration of a European policy in conflict with cherished American ideas, but which the United States will be, when too late, unable to impede. I hope the experience of the past will not be thrown away, and cannot believe otherwise than that this House will vote down all amendments looking to the further abandonment or destruction of our Navy and its establishments.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have sought the attention of this House; and if I can secure that attention for a few minutes, I desire to give expression to some views on the general condition of the country which I trust may tend to promote reform by showing the necessity for it, and I desire also to say some things in reference to the people of my own State, which I hope may tend to remove prejudices which exist against them in the minds of many honest people of the North and, by the removal of these prejudices, produce a better feeling toward them.

It has been well said that "plain words are best," and if there be any one place where plain words may be more fittingly spoken than another, that place should be on the floor of the American Congress. While each member in this House represents in an especial sense his immediate constituency, whose interest it is his duty to guard, he is also in a much broader sense charged within the limits of the Constitution with legislation for the general welfare of the whole country; and as a wound to any part or member of the body affects the whole body, so legislation which is unjust to any part of the country, however insignificant, or legislation which discriminates in favor of any part of the country, however great, will in the end produce evil; and we can only promote the "general welfare" by carefully guarding and protecting the rights and interests of every part. This we cannot do if our judgments are warped by prejudices or if we shut our eyes to wrongs that exist in any section of the country because they seem not to affect our immediate constituencies. It is by a free interchange of opinions and a candid statement of the conditions, the wants, the rights, and the wrongs of our respective sections that we are enabled to inform ourselves and to do exact justice to all—to remedy evils resulting from national legislation if any exist, and to prevent a recurrence of wrongs if any have been perpetrated; and by doing this we, each and every one of us, best discharge our duties and best serve our own people.

The substance as well as the form must be preserved.

It was a poet and not a statesman who said:

> For forms of state let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administered is best.

So far as this sentiment ignores the virtue of forms I do not indorse it, but the best form of government may be administered so ignorantly or so corruptly as to destroy the virtue of the good "form" and make it, in fact, a very bad government. "A sound mind in a sound body" has been, from very ancient times, regarded as constituting the highest type of man; and a good "form of state," a sound constitutional government, wisely, honestly, well and faithfully administered, constitutes the best type of government. We have in our Constitution, in my judgment, the best form of government that has been devised for mankind. The "form" is good, it is the "best;" and if the highest interest of the people has not at all times been secured or promoted by it, the fault has not been in the "form," but in the administration of it; and when this has been faulty, it is the duty of the people, whose government it is, to correct the evil, and reform, not the "form" of government, but the administration of it.

RESPONSIBILITY.

Power and duty carry with them responsibility. No one can dispute this proposition. The man who has power to act, and whose duty it is to act, is unquestionably responsible for his action, is responsible for the manner in which he exercises power and discharges his duty. If he does it well, he is entitled to commendation; if otherwise, to condemnation. This abstract proposition will not be denied.

Now, as a fact, and I state it as a fact which no candid man can controvert, the republican party for nearly fifteen years has had absolute control of this Government. In each branch of the national Legislature that party had much of the time a majority of more than two-thirds, and could enact any law that might be deemed conducive to the public good or promotive of party interest. I know that it has been attempted by straitened party leaders, who see and feel the force of the corruption which has marked the administration of public affairs, to break that force and shirk responsibility by charging that the administration of Andrew Johnson was democratic. A distinguished republican, a prominent aspirant for the Presidency, (I allude to Mr. MORTON,) has had the candor to admit that "there has been a good deal stolen;" but he says—I quote his words:

> The administration of this Government was substantially in the hands of the democratic party during the years 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868. I have here a statement of the tax on whisky during this period of substantial democratic administration as collected, leaving off the hundreds. For the fiscal year ending the 1st of July, 1866, the receipts were $33,268,000; for 1867, $33,542,000; and for 1868, $18,655,000, with a tax of $2 per gallon on whisky.

And another leading and distinguished republican [Mr. SHERMAN] says:

> We know very well that Andrew Johnson, with all the power in his hands, with officers scattered over the country, with a tax of $2, only succeeded in collecting $18,000,000 from the whisky tax, or the tax on 9,000,000 gallons; therefore when the Senator charges $1,200,000,000 of lost revenue, I hope he will charge the administration of Andrew Johnson in 1868 with $182,000,000 of the loss, because if the tax had been collected, $2 tax on 100,000,000 gallons would have produced $200,000,000, and we only got $18,000,000.

The facts as to the loss are true, but the statement that the Government was during this period "substantially in the hands of the democratic party" is so wild, is so great a mistake, that I am utterly astounded that it should emanate from statesmen holding the highest places in their party, and I am saddened by the thought that it is possible that the weight of such eminent names may impose it upon the country and serve to divert the public mind from the authors of frauds upon the revenues which these gentlemen are obliged to concede. But the charge that the democratic party had control of this Government in 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868 seems to me entirely "too thin" to impose upon any one. The republican party had a majority of more than two-thirds in the Senate and in the House, and Andrew Johnson had been chosen as one of their leaders. He was elected by them. No democrat voted for him; and when our republican friends seek to hold the democratic party responsible for the action of public officers, they ought at least to have the fairness to allow that party to select the officers for whose acts they are to be held responsible. I myself, in view of the selections they have made from their own party, should most earnestly protest against being held to account for a democratic President elected solely by republican votes. He would be a rare democrat indeed, and from his begetting it would be wonderful if things went well with the country. However, our republican friends seem to select as by instinct a certain class of men for office, and it may be that when they went into the democratic party to find an officer that instinct guided the selection, and it would perhaps be unreasonable to expect them to make a better selection from the democratic party than from their own.

But to be serious, even if Andrew Johnson had been a democratic President, chosen by the democratic party, and for whose acts that party could be honestly held responsible, which is not the fact, every candid and truthful man must concede that he was powerless. All his important appointments had to be confirmed by the Senate, and, as I have stated, the republicans had largely more than two-thirds of that body; but not content with this, with the intent to deprive him of all power, which they did effectually, they passed early in March, 1867, the act regulating the tenure of certain civil officers. This act stripped him of the power to remove or control in the slightest degree his Cabinet and other officers, who by the time-honored usage of the country had been held to be more immediately responsible to the Executive and should be in accord with him. This act not only deprived Andrew Johnson of the right of removal as it had been exercised prior to that time, but we all remember how certain officers, of very delicate sensibilities but hostile to the President, did "stick," to use a noted word of the day, and, instead of his being responsible, he had no party power whatever, and having no power, according to the maxim with which we set out, he had no responsibility. His Cabinet and subordinates, those "officers scattered over the country," were all republicans, "dyed in the wool," and most of them hostile to Andrew Johnson. He had no power over their action. By the tenure-of-office act he was liable to a fine of $10,000 and to imprisonment for five years if he attempted to remove one of these officers, though he might have been caught stealing, and many doubtless were engaged in that popular official vice; and any one whom he might appoint was liable to a like punishment if he should attempt to exercise the functions of office.

But it is puerile and, to say the least of it, uncandid to say that the democratic party had control of this Government during that period; and it would be equally as uncandid for any republican to say that his party did not have absolute political power, so far as a party can have it, from March, 1861, to the present time, certainly to the sitting of this Congress; and they now have power to prevent any action which they may choose to prevent. Well, they have had the power, and, as I have said, power, duty, and responsibility go together; and if the country has prospered and is now prosperous; if industry has had its full reward; if public offices have been faithfully, honestly, and economically administered; if no one has been oppressed; if public officers have discharged their duties well and with reference to the public good; if confidence in the integrity of public servants gives to the people a feeling of safety and security; if there has been no legislation tending to the advantage of a favored few at the expense of the many, no discriminating legislation by which individuals have become millionaires while the laboring millions have languished and the industrious poor have been robbed of the reward of their labors; if the public revenues have been collected faithfully and honestly accounted for; if we have had a currency that supplied the wants of trade and was just to all classes; if, in one sentence, the people are to-day contented, prosperous, and happy, then it would be unjust, it would be uncandid, it would be dishonest to withhold commendation and praise from the party which has been in power, and not to give to that party the plaudit and reward of "well done."

But if, on the other hand, the country has not been prosperous; if industry has not had its fair reward; if reckless extravagance, fraud, and dishonesty have marked in any degree the administration of public affairs; if public officers, (the head of the Government setting the example,) instead of discharging well their duties and with reference to the public good, have regarded and treated their offices as private property to be used for private gain and advantage or as personal rewards to retainers and partisans for personal favor and party support; if the confidence of the people in the integrity of public servants has been shaken and there is a feeling of uncertainty pervading the public mind; if by partial and unjust legislation monopolies have been established and classes favored, and wealth heaped upon these favored classes; if the purses of those favored few have been made fat with yellow gold, doubling and quadrupling their investments, while the laboring masses have not been able to get even "rag money," as it is now derisively called, though at one time it was little short of treason to say aught to its discredit, and that too when these favored classes were buying with it their gold-bearing bonds at prices ranging at from less than forty cents to eighty-five cents on the dollar in gold; and now these bonds are to be paid in full in gold, dollar for dollar.

I must not be and will not be understood as saying one word against the constitutional obligation to pay these bonds, but what I mean to say, and what I do say, is that the party in power, with all its pretensions to regard for the poor and lowly, is responsible for that system of finance which has enriched the few and beggard the million—which has given to the capitalist gold and to the laborer "rags," which has paralyzed industry and filled the land with bankrupts. By establishing a banking system which excludes competition and every basis of credit other than national bonds, (for the banking act with the 10 per cent. tax effectually does this,) they have given to these bondholders and the corporations established by them the great and dangerous power of controlling the industry and to a great extent the legislation of the country.

If these things be so; if all the industries of the country have languished, commerce been destroyed, agriculture, manufactures, shipping decayed; if confidence has been destroyed and universal distrust overspreads the land; if the people have mourned and are mourning, and we have high authority for saying "when the wicked rule the people mourn"—if, in one sentence, the people to-day are not contented, prosperous, and happy—then it would be candid, just, fair, truthful, honest, to say that the long dominant, controlling republican party is responsible for this condition of affairs, and it is the duty of the people to correct, not the form of government, but the administration of it.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Economy and simplicity should characterize a republican government, and honesty and fidelity should mark the character of its public servants. In the earlier days of the Republic this was the case. From the 4th day of March, 1789, the day the Federal Constitution went into operation, down to June 30, 1875, the entire net ordinary receipts of the Government, exclusive of loans, amounted to $6,337,034,618.25. Of this sum only $1,841,953,353.62 were collected from the foundation of the Government down to 1861, and $4,495,081,264.63 have been collected since that time. That is, largely more than twice as much money has been collected from the people in fourteen years of republican rule than was collected in more than seventy years prior to their advent to power. Now let us see how about the expenses for the same period of time. From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1875, the net ordinary expenses of the Government—as any one may see by adding the figures under the head of "net ordinary expenses," on pages 65 to 67 of the official report (pamphlet copy) of the Register of the Treasury, made November 4, 1875—amounted to $6,801,956,954.69. I have caused a table to be made, grouping these expenditures so as to show the amounts expended each four years of the successive administrations of the Government. Here it is:

From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861, the entire net ordinary expenses of the Government amounted to $1,581,706,195.34. From June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1875, fourteen years of republican rule, the net ordinary expenses amounted to $5,220,250,759.35—and this is exclusive of the public or war debt; that is, fourteen years of republican rule cost the Government more than three times as much money as the whole cost of the Government from 1789 to 1861, a period of seventy-two years. But it may well be said that the ordinary expenses of the Government during the war were necessarily increased. That is true, and to make the comparison fair let us take a period of ten years since the war; and I wish it to be borne in mind that I am now speaking of the "net ordinary expenses" of the Government, exclusive of the interest paid on the public debt, which amounted to over $1,000,000,000, and the sums paid on the public debt itself, which amounted to many hundred millions more. From March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861, the expenses of the Government—embracing a period of more than seventy-two years, covering the war of 1812, the Indian wars, and the Mexican war—amounted, as I have already shown, to only $1,581,706,195.34. The net ordinary expenses of the four years of Johnson's administration was $1,012,420,202.14; six years of President Grant, $1,021,813,950—making in ten years of peace the enormous sum of $2,034,233,412.14, being nearly one-third more than all the expenses of the Government for seventy-two years, from 1789 to 1861, including the war of 1812, the Indian and the Mexican wars; and if you add to the ordinary expenses of the six years of President Grant's administration the amount of principal and interest paid on the public debt, it will amount to $4,008,438,461.82; that is, more than two and a half times as much as the entire expenses of the Government from March 4, 1789, to June 30, 1861. I have here the table showing the total expenditures under the administration of President Grant for six years, from June 30, 1869, to June 30, 1875, as will be seen from the official report of the Register of the Treasury, page 67 of the pamphlet report:

FRAUDS.

But this is not the worst. I have shown from the official report that the net ordinary revenue collected by the Government and which went into the Treasury since 1861 amounted to $4,495,081,264.63. Now I propose to show from high republican authority and from official sources that that was not more than three-fourths of the amount that ought to have gone into the Treasury, and that the remaining one-fourth, amounting in round numbers to $1,500,000,000, that ought to have gone into the Treasury, has been lost to the Government, lost by the failure of those whose duty it was to collect it—to do so, or to account for it; lost, I said—that puts it too mildly, stolen—stolen from the people by corrupt and fraudulent officials and combinations and rings. And now for the proof.

The commission appointed by the President under the act of March 4, 1871, consisting of George William Curtis, Alexander G. Cattell, Joseph Medill, Damson A. Walker, E. B. Elliott, Joseph H. Blackfan, and David C. Cox, made their report in 1871. And the President by his special message of December 19, 1871, transmitting this report to Congress, indorses it and "asks for all the strength which Congress can give to enable me [him] to carry out the reforms recommended by the commissioners." These commissioners say, (Senate Documents No. 1 to 2, second session Forty-second Congress, 1871–'72:)

It is not easy to compute in figures the exact economical difference between a good and a bad system of the civil service. It is, necessarily, a matter of inference and of comparison between the probable operation of a careless and a careful method. But it is calculated by those who have made a careful study of all the facts, that one-fourth of the revenues of the United States are annually lost in the collection, and for a large part of that loss a system of the service which is partially unsound may reasonably be held responsible.

Now, if this estimate is correct—and it is an estimate made by the highest republican authority, and I doubt not and I think I can show is under rather than over the mark—if this estimate is correct, not more than three-fourths of the revenue that ought to have gone there has found its way into the Treasury, leaving the other one-fourth, amounting in exact figures to $1,498,360,421.54, to be accounted for as "strayed, lost, or stolen," especially the last. But were these commissioners correct in their estimate? I propose to show that their estimate of the amount is, if anything, too small. The Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Fessenden) in his annual report for 1864 said "the annual yield of our distilleries has been about 100,000,000 gallons." The census of 1860 shows that it was then over 90,000,000; and I suppose I may safely appeal to the observation of the country for proof that the consumption of ardent spirits has kept full pace with the increase of population. I have here a statement showing the number of gallons of distilled spirits on which the tax was collected and returned to the Office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for each fiscal year since the organization of the present internal-revenue system:

It will be seen from this statement that the whole amount of distilled spirits accounted for from 1863 to 1875 was only 616,809,390 gallons, when it should have been in fact 1,300,000,000. In 1868 it was only 7,224,808 gallons; that is the year in which the $182,000,000 of which Mr. SHERMAN speaks were lost. In 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, when the tax was $2 per gallon, $800,000,000 ought to have been realized from spirits alone, but only $104,000,000 in round numbers were paid into the Treasury, leaving $696,000,000 in round numbers lost to the Government. I do not mean to say that all this money was stolen by the officials. Much of it doubtless was, but the tax on much of it was never collected at all, though it was the duty of the officers to collect it. The statement that the high tax amounted to a prohibition is utterly unfounded. As proof of this and of the fact that the tax was not honestly collected, the whisky sold in the market by the gallon for less than the amount of the tax, and taking the value of money into consideration was as cheap as it is now. It is no excuse for those whose duty it was to collect the tax to say it was not collected. They could not thus evade responsibility; and there are abundant facts going to show that, by combinations and rings, bribery and corruption, the Government was grossly defrauded. While the tax was $2 per gallon, if all of it had been faithfully collected and accounted for, $1,200,000,000 in round numbers ought to have gone into the Treasury. Instead of that, less than $300,000,000 were accounted for, leaving $900,000,000 lost to the Government. Now this was upon the single article of distilled spirits. That is, upon this one article the Government was defrauded out of $900,000,000 in six years. Now who will say that the estimate of Mr. Curtis's commission is not under rather than over the mark?

Let us look at this a little in detail. It is conceded that $182,000,000 were lost to the Treasury in one year alone, 1868, on this one subject of taxation. Just think of it! In one single year of republican rule there was lost or stolen from this single source of revenue ten times as much as the whole expenses of the Government for the eight years of Washington's administration, nine times as much as the whole four years of John Adams, four times as much as the whole eight years of Jefferson; $40,000,000 more than the whole eight years of Madison, embracing the war of 1812 with Great Britain; $75,000,000 more than the whole eight years of Monroe; more than $130,000,000 more than the whole four years of John Q. Adams; more than $40,000,000 more than the whole eight years of Andrew Jackson; $60,000,000 more than the whole four years of Van Buren. And some of us are old enough to remember how the economical spirit of the country was aroused by the extravagance of Martin Van Buren, and how in 1840 he was overwhelmed by the people because of what was then thought to be extravagance, but in comparison with these times would be considered stingy economy, for in one single year of republican rule we have seen that $60,000,000 more was lost to the Government on spirits alone than the whole four years of his administration cost. In this one year $75,000,000 more was lost or stolen than the cost of the whole four years of John Tyler's administration; $16,000,000 more than the whole four years of Polk, embracing the period of the Mexican war; $16,000,000 more than the four years of Taylor and Fillmore; and more was lost on whisky alone in 1866, '67, '68 than the whole cost of the Government under the combined eight years of Pierce and Buchanan

The amount out of which the Government has been defrauded is so immense that, like the centennial exhibition in Philadelphia, it bewilders you and it cannot all be taken in at once by the eye or comprehended by the mind. Just think of it again, $182,000,000 in one single year on spirits alone. Why this is $50,000,000 more than the whole assessed property of the State of North Carolina, as shown by the census of 1870. Just think again! If all the property of this once proud old State—land, houses, corn, everything—were put up at auction and sold for cash it would not amount to as much as the whisky fraud upon the Government amounted to in one year. It was more than the assessed value, according to the census of 1870, of Alabama, or Arkansas, or Delaware, or Florida, or Mississippi, or New Hampshire, or Vermont, or Texas.

Who will say with this exhibit—in which nothing is said of the frauds in the collection of the tobacco tax, for I have not time to go into that—that the estimate of Mr. Curtis's commission is large enough? But assuming it not to be over the mark, we have shown by the highest proof that the Government has been defrauded out of one-fourth of its revenue; that is, in round numbers, $1,500,000,000; but this does not represent all the loss. If this money had been faithfully collected and honestly applied, it would have gone to the extinguishment of that much of the public debt. So that to represent the real loss the interest must be added. Now, any one who will take the pains to calculate it will see that $1,500,000,000 + $600,000,000 = $2,100,000,000; the interest would exceed $600,000,000. Now, the public debt is less in round numbers than $2,240,000,000. So that it will be seen that nearly enough has been lost to the Government to pay the entire public debt. Is it not time for people to arouse themselves? If this money had been faithfully collected and honestly applied and economy had marked the administration of the Government, how different would be the condition of the country to-day.

There would be no public debt hanging like a mighty weight around the necks of the people to paralyze their energies and sink them in despair; no bonds and bondholders to be paid in gold. The ordinary old-time receipts from customs would abundantly defray the expenses of the Government, and there would be no necessity for internal revenue, with its attendant train of assessors, collectors, and deputy assessors and collectors, supervisors, detectives, and spies, its rings, its frauds, and its thieves harassing the people and disgracing the nation.

The tobacco-grower could sell to whom he pleased, for there would be no more tax on his industry. The man with his little orchard or vineyard could turn it to profit by distilling his fruit, which he cannot now do, because under a complicated system of revenue regulations he does not know when he is safe, and if he did he could not compete with the mammoth rings organized under the shadow of the Government.

But this is not the worst. In the same report from which I have read the commissioners say, on page 22 of the report:

> We would not exaggerate the importance of the peril, but the constant exposure of official dishonesty, the vast system of political corruption, the disclosure of which has produced a peaceful revolution in the city of New York, should suggest to every good citizen the possibility of a similar revolution which might not be peaceful. If by that great and organized corruption it had been possible—and such a contingency is not improbable—to decide a presidential election, and in a manner universally believed to be fraudulent, the consequences would probably have been a civil war. If such corruption is not staid, the result is only postponed; and nothing so surely fosters it as the system which makes the civil service a party prize, and convulses the country every four years with a desperate strife of office.

Remember that this was in 1871. If the official frauds and corruptions then exposed were sufficient to arouse in the minds of good republican gentlemen, appointed by President Grant and indorsed by him, apprehensions of safety to the Government because the people would not bear it, how infinitely worse is it now when in one single collection district, as at Saint Louis, millions are stolen? And I beg that our friends will remember that this comes from republicans of the "straighest sect." No southern confederate or disloyal democrat had anything to do with this report. If there was danger then, as they thought there was, how infinitely worse, I repeat, is it now?

It has been abundantly proved by the investigations instituted by this House that the poor soldiers on the frontiers have been robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars, charges upon their purchases by post-traders who had to pay to the Secretary of War, to the brother of the President, (see testimony of Orvill Grant, and others,) and to his friends and partisans, money to get their places, and money to aid in carrying elections. Of this the proof is conclusive.

The freedmen have been robbed of hundreds of thousands of dollars by corrupt men who, many of them professing to be pious, have called themselves their friends and guardians. Of the sum deposited in the Freedman's Savings Bank in this city by over seventy thousand depositors, poor freedmen, the sum of about $1,500,000, saved from their hard earnings, has been lost. The poor washerwoman, whose hands were shriveled by labor at the wash-tub; the day-laborer who received his fifty cents or seventy-five cents for his day's hard toil—these put their small earnings in the bank, confidingly expecting it to come back to them with gain in the hour of want, as was promised to them; but, for shame be it said of men—men, most of them, with white skins—the most of this was lost, stolen; and, still deeper the shame, while the poor freedman wants bread and lives in rags, the thieves live in luxury and roll through your streets in splendor, and think it full compensation to the poor negro to have it known that $300,000 of it, as the evidence will show, was lost to aid in carrying the elections in favor of the "party of advanced moral ideas;" for the proof is, as I am reliably informed, that the election in North Carolina in 1872 and the election of President Grant cost the bank that sum. And these are the special friends of the colored man.

Whatever else may be said of us, I make the assertion, and I defy contradiction, that the African has attained to a higher degree of civilization among the white people of the South than has been known to his race anywhere else on the globe. No one of the colored races in any other part of the world has been elevated to the high privileges or deemed capable of the exalted duties of a free citizen of a great republic. We have brought him from a state of barbarism to be considered, at least by our republican friends, as their equals; but if there is on the part of the white people of the South pride of race and of Caucasian descent it is not unnatural, and what is natural cannot be very wrong. Looking back on the past, we have seen all great achievements in arts, sciences, governments, laws, and material wealth the result of the labor, the toil, the genius, and the guiding intellect of the white man. With the blood of his race has been a long career of progress, and it has been only by his courage and proud spirit that free governments have been established, and while I have pity for the white man who would hate a black man simply because he is black, I have scorn for the white man who is not proud of his race. The pride of the Saxon is a hostage to honor, and while this lasts truth, justice, and civil liberty are safe, and whether they be white or black, the rights of all, as established by constitutions and laws, are secure.

NORTH CAROLINA.

And now I wish to say a few things in vindication of my own State against a charge preferred by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.] That gentleman, some time ago, when the question of amnesty was before this House, was pleased to read, with evident gratification and with his then triumphant air, (I am glad to observe that he appears more subdued and of milder mood since,) a letter from his friend W. W. Holden, once governor of North Carolina, which reflected unjustly and untruly not only upon the democratic party of that State, but upon the whole State, inasmuch as the act of which he complained was attributed, not to a sense of justice in the tribunal before which he was tried and convicted, but to partisan persecution. That letter has gone to the country with the indorsement of the gentleman from Maine, who would not permit a moment's time to gentlemen on this floor who desired at once to repel a grave charge against their State. It has gone to the country in a speech of bitterness and hate, which some supposed was intended for the amiable purpose of making a President from the State of Maine, but which, failing in that, can only serve the bad purpose of keeping alive in the minds of those who follow him feelings toward one section of this country which every friend of good government, every friend of peace, every patriot ought to wish to see buried forever. That gentleman, with an inexcusable ignorance of the facts, (inexcusable because he would not allow an answer in the way of correction to a question tauntingly propounded by himself,) said that it was "purely a political impeachment; not prosecution, but persecution; persecution of a man for opinion's sake, * * * a Union man of North Carolina."

I now have the opportunity, and I avail myself of it, to say to the gentleman from Maine that every substantial statement contained in the letter of his friend is untrue, and I propose, without any feeling of bitterness, but with a feeling of pain and regret that such a letter should have been written, and in discharge of what I conceive to be a sacred duty to the good, true, and honest people of the State which I in part represent, to make a brief and plain statement of the leading facts relating to the crimes, the impeachment, the trial, and the conviction of the author of that letter.

His crimes, as set forth in eight articles of impeachment, were briefly as follows:

First. Raising unlawfully armed bodies of troops, and causelessly declaring the county of Alamance in a state of insurrection, and unlawfully arresting Lucian H. Murray and eighty-one other citizens of that county and detaining them, when the civil officers of the law were in the full exercise of their functions.

Second. The same in Caswell County as to Mr. Kerr and many others.

Third. Unlawfully arresting and imprisoning Josiah Turner in the county of Orange.

Fourth. Unlawfully arresting and detaining John Kerr and others in the county of Caswell.

Fifth. Refusing to obey the writ of habeas corpus in the case of A. G. Moore.

Sixth. Refusing to obey the writ of habeas corpus in the case of John Kerr and eighteen others in Caswell County.

Seventh. Unlawfully recruiting a large body of troops from the States of North Carolina and Tennessee, and placing them under the command of one Kirk and other desperadoes from the State of Tennessee, and with those troops unlawfully arresting and imprisoning John Kerr and many others; for hanging by the neck Lucian Murray, William Patton, and others; for thrusting Josiah Turner and F. A. Wiley in a loathsome dungeon without lawful authority; for issuing his warrant upon D. A. Jenkins, treasurer of the State, for $70,000 to pay those unlawful troops.

Eighth. For inviting and procuring the State treasurer to disregard the injunction to restrain him from paying the sum of $80,000 or more out of the public treasury for the unlawful purpose of paying said troops.

This is a brief abstract of the crimes of which he was charged and found guilty; the facts were clearly proved, and he is mistaken when he says it was done by democrats, if he means, as the gentleman from Maine understands him, to say it was a party vote of conviction. And without conceding that it is necessary to vindicate the honor of the democratic senators who upon their oaths voted to convict upon clear proof, I will give a statement of the vote. The constitution requires two-thirds to convict. On the sixth charge there were only eight senators who voted "not guilty;" forty-one voted "guilty;" five republican senators voted "guilty." Every republican lawyer in the senate voted to convict except one, and the exception was the son-in-law of the accused. Of the eight senators who voted "not guilty," one was the son-in-law of the accused; four were colored members, with no knowledge of law; and the other three were party politicians, one of whom was deputy United States assessor, who was indicted in the Federal court for the crime of forgery, plead guilty, was sentenced to prison by a Federal judge, and was afterward pardoned. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that these were the crimes, and this the manner of the conviction, of one who subscribes himself "your friend." As I have said, of the five republican lawyers in the senate all except one, the son-in-law, voted guilty, and I venture to say that there is not a respectable lawyer in or out of the State of North Carolina who, with a knowledge of all the facts and the law, would say that an intelligent and impartial jury could have found any other verdict, or who would say that the acts proved were not in plain and open violation of the constitution and the laws.

The State judiciary had been exhausted by him. And just here I wish to say, as an act of justice, that it was to an upright Federal judge (Judge Brooks) that the people were indebted for a vindication of the majesty of the law and the discharge of the men so unlawfully held by the usurpations of the governor.

Upon conviction, the disability of which he complains followed as a constitutional result; the constitution of 1868, put upon the people by him and his party against the votes of the democratic party, having fixed the penalty. He is equally mistaken in saying that there was a refusal by a strict party vote to remove his disabilities. Every lawyer knows that the Legislature had no power to remove his disabilities, and it was doubted whether the convention, having been a restricted one, had the power to do so; but as it was, the removal of his disability was defeated, if I am not greatly mistaken, by a republican vote. He is equally mistaken in saying that he is the only man in North Carolina who cannot hold office. He stands not alone. By the same constitution which disqualifies him from holding office, there are several thousand persons, mostly of his own political faith, convicted of various crimes, most of them before republican judges, who labor under the same disability imposed by a constitution which they themselves made. He says "I am the only man in North Carolina who cannot hold office," and writes that while holding one of the fattest offices in the State—that of postmaster at Raleigh.

But the gentleman from Maine says he was a "Union man." Yes, like Longstreet and other Union men of the South, he has put on the livery of the republican party as a badge of fealty, and that is enough for the gentleman from Maine, and I shall not trouble myself to enlighten his ignorance, though he may be laughed at in North Carolina, and I doubt not that even the ex-governor himself, when he looks at the sacred gold pen with which he signed the ordinance of secession—a pen never to be desecrated by other use—and remembers the pleasant (cruel) things which he said about the Union and Union men, will chuckle audibly and, hugging his official robes close about him, feel more secure against the competition of "the late insurgent leaders" one of his associates.

Governor Holden professes to be a Christian, and remembering the prayer taught by our blessed Saviour, "forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us," he might at least have been silent and not asked the condemnation of his "fellow trespassers," among whom he may be said to have been one of the chiefs; but he has volunteered as a witness to furnish to the enemies of my State fuel for the fires of hate, and I have deemed it just and due to the people of that State, who have been traduced and maligned for party purposes, to say thus much. I shall ever stand ready to vindicate to the utmost of my ability the fair fame and honor of my native State, for she is to me the dearest spot on earth. I know that she has been under a cloud. I know that since the war under the guise of loyalty her people have been robbed of their property and, what is much dearer to them, once boasting the proud title of the "honest old North State," she has been robbed of her honor. I know that after war had done its work, and her body lay helpless, vultures preyed upon her; and it is not the least distressing thought that she had within her own borders men, political serfs, ready to attorn to any party that would give them office, and that these men combined with adventurers without character, and who cared nothing for her honor, to fasten upon her a debt which she is not now able to pay and which she cannot pay without ruin to her people, a debt for which she never derived an equivalent of five cents on the dollar. Let me illustrate by a statement which I hope will disarm the malice of her enemies.

By the convention of 1868, and the legislation of that year, a debt now amounting to more than $15,000,000 was fastened upon the State. The two delegates to that convention, and the two members, and the senator in that Legislature from my county, and all the men who voted for them combined, did not at that time pay as much property tax as any one of half a dozen men in the county who were not allowed to vote under the reconstruction acts.

The district which I now have the honor to represent, and which I am proud to represent, was represented on this floor by a man whose highest merit was that he did not pretend to be honest, and who openly said that he "was down South on the make," and that he did not blame the democrats for disliking carpet-baggers. This man was guilty of the crime of bribery, and when charged with it on this floor, to evade the inevitable expulsion, he resigned, as others have since done, and has not that I am aware of since been seen in the district which he disgraced. In resigning, however, he had the cool candor to say, "As soon as I was aware that I had done wrong, [he had only taken $1,000 for a cadetship,] I endeavored to make a return as far as I could. I returned the money immediately, and I have tendered my resignation to the governor of my State, believing that it is the duty of a member of Congress to make vacant the place he has disgraced." But it was all made right when he said, "I have given $12,000 to control the presidential election in my State." (Congressional Globe, volume 76, page 1617.)

Any one who wishes to see a curious production can find it in his letter, published in the congressional proceedings of the Forty-first Congress on page 1617 of the seventy-sixth volume of the Congressional Globe.

But it is said that the South is represented on this floor by confederates, and whenever we raise our voices in behalf of good and honest government, and exposure of fraud and corruption, the force of what we say is sought to be broken by the cry of rebellion and disloyalty. Now let me say one thing about that. The war, as every candid man will concede, resulted from a long-protracted and often bitter difference of opinion upon certain political questions. These differences became sectional, and culminated in an attempt by one of the sections to withdraw from the Union, and a resolve on the part of the other that the Union should not be severed. The issue was submitted to the arbitrament of the sword, and brave men fought it out. The result is known to the world; every question involved in that contest was honestly surrendered, and the soldiers of the South, with a quiet and submission to authority that was remarkable, sought their homes and the sweet pursuits of peace. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war;" and they have bent all their energies to the tasks of peace. I can say this of a truth as to the soldiers of the South, and I believe it to be true of the great body of brave soldiers of the North.

The Union was to be preserved, and to be preserved for the sake, not simply of the Union, but of civil liberty and good government. The soldier who was roused to deeds of daring and courage by the cry of the Constitution and the Union, and by the rally of the old flag, believed that civil liberty was to be preserved by that Union and under that Constitution. The soldier of the South, when he took with him the same Constitution, was equally conscientious when he offered his life in the conviction that he, too, was fighting for civil liberty; both were alike devoted to the same idol, civil liberty—the one fighting to maintain it in the Union, believing that in this way alone it could be preserved; the other to maintain it in a new confederacy, but both claiming to be freemen and the right to be freemen. The Union was victorious, and from that day it was settled that civil liberty and good government must be preserved in the Union, and not out of it. The right peaceably to secede and the sectional institution which was the alleged cause of secession were surrendered by us, surrendered in good faith by brave and true men, and we were again in the Union. But our right to be freemen was not involved in the issue. We never surrendered our manhood; we never surrendered our right to free government as we inherited it from our fathers; we never surrendered the proud and glorious memories of the past; we never consented to be slaves or cravens. We must be in this Union of States as equals or the Union is so in name and not in deed. The South must be represented by men of her choice or this is a republican government in name and not in deed. And as long as the South is represented on this floor by men of her choice, she will be represented by men of honor, and men of honor would not have her represented otherwise.

Since the days of 1865 we have not always been thus represented here, but we have had an abiding faith that devotion to constitutional government would prevail, and that when the stormy passions begotten of war had subsided the bright goddess of civil liberty would resume her throne in American hearts and that loyalty to party would give place to devotion at her shrine. Sir, the man who would have us back in the Union as slaves and not as freemen; the man who would have us here as disgraced criminals and not as brethren with whom, the unhappy but manly strife having ended, they were to live as brethren again; brethren in unity of aim and purpose; brethren again in affection to a common country, just to all her sons; brethren again in the proud memories of the past and in the bright hopes of the future—the men who would not have us thus back, who would have the States of the South in the Union as conquered provinces and not as free States—such men know not the spirit of free government; such men would tyrants be, and, failing that, slaves. I am glad to believe that such are not the men of the North. Exceptions there are, but I am glad to know that thousands on thousands of her people hail us as brethren again in the Union and as worthy the name of brethren. I am glad to know that the soldiers who fought the battles of the Union desire to see the fruits of their victories secured by the preservation of a peaceful, harmonious, and happy Union of States. I am glad to know that Hancock—brave and gallant soldier, wise and accomplished civilian, a hero in the field, a statesman in counsel—that McClellan and McClernand, that soldiers of the Union army, my gallant friends on this floor, and the thousands whom they represent, that the soldier-statesman from Massachusetts and the generous Representative from Pennsylvania on the other side of this House—I am glad to know that men like these represent the feeling of the people, and that the doctrine of hate, like the questions which divided us, must be of the past.

Let me say to our friends at the North that they have the same interest in the liberties of the South that we have: they have the same interest in good government that we have. You cannot make an Ireland or a Hungary or a Poland of the South without endangering your own liberties. The States of the South must be free, living, breathing, sound, and healthy members of this Union. You cannot afford to have a dead body fastened to the living. It was an ancient custom of certain tyrants to punish offenders by binding the body of a dead man to the living criminal and compelling him to carry it about till the contagion from the putrid mass took away life. Virgil gives an account of one of these tyrants, Mezentius, and describes the awful punishment.

> These, limb to limb and face to face, he joined,
> Till choked with stench the lingering wretches lay,
> And in the loathed embraces died away.

And it was in allusion to this horrid custom that St. Paul uttered the exclamation, "O, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" You cannot afford to have such a dead body joined to you, and have liberty survive it; and I appeal to every man who loves civil liberty and good government and who desires to see the Union again strong in the affections of all the people, to work for reform, to work to restore to the people a government in which economy, honesty, capacity, and fidelity shall characterize every department, and harmony, good-will, and brotherly love shall prevail in every section. I think I know the feeling and sentiment of the people of the South; and for them I will pledge that none will go before them in earnest prayers and zealous works to attain this happy end.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] is not in his seat, that I might testify to him personally my sense of the great advantage the country may derive from confiding important duties to gentlemen who are utterly ignorant of the subject-matter upon which legislation is proposed. I am quite sure that if he had known anything of the navy-yards of the country or of the history of the growth and development of our naval establishment or the revolutions that have taken place in naval architecture and armament during the last fifteen years, the world would never have received the novel suggestions he offered to-day touching navy-yards, the proper sites for them, &c. I can certify to their novelty but not to their value, and I think he may become famous in naval history as the man who believed at this late day that iron ships ought to be built on salt water and that the great reservoir of machinery for the construction of vessels and armament under the exigencies of war ought to be located in an exposed sea-port. Sir, had he known anything of the subject his imagination would have been restrained and he would have simply given us details, practical illustrations, opinions of distinguished line officers or naval engineers, and told us nothing but what we knew or might learn by the study of competent authorities. But we should have had no new range given to our imaginations. Unlike him, I shall deal with facts, and give the committee a history of the establishment of a naval station at League Island.

In this matter I can define my position best in the language of the gentle Desdemona—

I do perceive here a divided duty.

I have been identified with the history of the project from the time Gideon Wells, the then Secretary of the Navy, made known confidentially to Alexander Henry, the then mayor of Philadelphia, that a commission of distinguished naval officers had been appointed by him to secretly survey the coast and determine privately and report the best site on the Atlantic coast for a fresh-water naval station, where land enough could be had in proximity to ample supplies of coal and iron and skilled workers in metals to establish the works for the construction of heavy material for large iron-clad or iron vessels and for the manufacture of heavy armor and implements of war and the machinery for handling such implements; and that the board had reported to him that in League Island they found a sight incomparable not only in the United States but in the whole world in combining all these conditions. Just at that time I was made acquainted confidentially by the Navy Department with the operation.

The mayor of Philadelphia in that communication was requested to ascertain in whom the title of the land was vested, whether it could be purchased, and, if so, upon what terms. He entered heartily into the honorable work confided to him, ascertained the price at which it could be had, and reported the facts to the Navy Department. At the suggestion of the ablest man I have met in connection with the American Navy, G. V. Fox, then Assistant Secretary, the Secretary suggested that if possible the title to the island and back channel should be acquired contingently upon Congress making appropriation for its purchase. Mayor Henry, believing that if it became known that the Government wanted the property speculators would intervene and the cost would be greatly increased, induced the city of Philadelphia to purchase it and hold it for the Government. It did purchase it at a cost of nearly half a million dollars, and it not only held it for the benefit of the Government, but it conveyed it without consideration to the Government absolutely on condition that it should be held as a naval station, and that the small yard containing about twenty acres, then obstructing the commercial progress of the city, should be removed.

Sir, I have said I do perceive here a divided duty. I feel to-night that, as a Philadelphian, I would be ready, if it were possible, to overwhelm Congress with my thanks if it would reconvey to Philadelphia these two and a quarter miles of its best river front, shutting its main avenue, Broad street, from access to tide-water; and during the whole of more than fourteen years I have been involved in contest on this subject I have never hesitated to say to my fellow-citizens that posterity would curse us for the wrong we did to Philadelphia in the granting of this six hundred acres of land, embracing more than two and a quarter miles of the most valued river front of the city. On the other hand, as an American citizen, I cannot be too grateful to my fellow-citizens for their generous devotion to the Government in securing to it a naval station unequaled in site in the world, and one which naval officers from England, France, and Russia have assured me, both at the Navy Department and when on League Island, is unequaled in its combined points of adaptation to the wants of the navies of the future anywhere in the world. As a Philadelphian I would rejoice at its retrocession, but as an American I would deplore the fatuity that prompted the act.

The imaginative and inexperienced gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] said that such an establishment ought to be at Brooklyn where it would be near the sea. The foreign officers, as well as our own, say that among its chiefest values are the facts that, while it has easy access to the sea and is protected abundantly by forts already existing at different points along the river by which it is approached, it is absolutely secure from attack; that the Government may gather stores for a war of half a century and keep them there without drain upon its general military or naval resources for their protection.

Why, sir, the Swamp Angel that hurled its ponderous shells into Charleston would destroy such an establishment from the open sea, if it were in Brooklyn. One of the great points in favor of League Island is its security; another is the fresh water that surrounds it. Salt water is the natural enemy of iron. Sea-water will eat up the heaviest iron plate; and nature, as if to protect it while exposed to foul sea-water, attracts to the surface of iron exposed to its action all sorts of parasites; so that, on the arrival home of a British iron-clad, the Ben Ledi, from a cruise, ten tons of muscles and barnacles were taken from her surface by mechanical processes, many of them having fastened so tightly and being of such solid and vitrified substance that in breaking them away great portions of the iron came with them.

These operations of nature threatened to preclude the possibility of the successful establishment of iron navies. But nature provides an antidote for every bane, and it was discovered that fresh water was the antidote to these. Had the Ben Ledi had a naval station in water fresh as that at League Island to resort to, in three days her surface would have been as clean as when she was launched. And, although the yard at Portsmouth, England, had cost over £60,000,000—something over $300,000,000—it was found useless when England began to create an iron navy, and she had to abandon it, except for repair and a station for wooden ships. To keep the iron vessels there was to destroy them or reduce their speed. To invite nature to so protect them against the effect of the poison of the sea as to reduce their speed from 20 to 30 per cent., as was often the case before the end of a year's cruise, was not a safe reliance. What did England do in this emergency? Why, with her three-hundred-million-dollar yard at Portsmouth, her government went to the headwaters of the Medway. They bought a site. They constructed immense fresh-water basins. They made an artificial channel to them, and there, having expended another $100,000,000, and having added to the ninety-five acres of their yard a tract of land very kindred to League Island, but embracing about two hundred and eighty-four acres, they went on increasing their fresh-water basins so as to have the cure at hand for the effect of the waters of Portsmouth and Brooklyn waters upon iron-clads and iron ships.

This is not imagination. I have not been studying this question anew. I am but repeating to the committee facts that I brought to the attention of the Thirty-eighth Congress in the winter of 1863 and 1864 in an elaborate report on this subject from the Naval Committee. And I propose to detain the committee with an occasional extract, not from my own statements, but from valuable financial papers I then reported.

The President had made reiterated recommendations for the establishment of a naval station and dock-yard for the purposes of an iron navy. The Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, on the 9th of June, 1862, made a communication to the Naval Committee, in which, referring to the President's message, he said:

> It is now generally conceded that vessels for fighting purposes must be heavily plated with iron if they are not built entirely of that material. In this, as in most costly fabrics, economy is reached through durability. Iron ship-building is new in this country; but few persons are engaged in it, and it is a novelty in our yards. Heavy iron beams, shafting, and thick iron plates can be procured from only two or three parties, and then in limited quantities and subject to great delay. Individuals have little use for iron of such magnitude as the Navy must have, and there must unavoidably be great outlay to prepare for the execution of such work. With only the Navy for a purchaser there can be no competition, and the Government will be compelled, under such circumstances, to pay almost any price the mills and forges may demand. No inconsiderable portions of an iron ship can be made and procured at the ordinary mills; and so far as it can be done it may be the best policy to be so supplied; but as the heavy and expensive portions cannot be so procured and unless the Government is prepared to execute the work it will be subject to imposition and its vessels to marked inferiority.
> Other nations, whose wooden ships-of-war far exceed our own in number, cannot afford to lay them aside, but are compelled to plate them with iron at a very great cost. They are not unaware of the disadvantage of this proceeding, but it is a present necessity. It must be borne in mind, however, that those governments which are striving for naval supremacy are sparing no expense to strengthen themselves by building iron vessels; and already their dock-yards are undergoing the necessary preparations for this change in naval architecture, notwithstanding those governments have at their command the greatest experience and the most extensive and complete iron and machine factories that private enterprise can produce. These facts are suggestive to our Government; and I desire to call your attention to the necessity of making the necessary provision for ourselves by providing the means and conveniences for building and repairing a navy such as the strength and character of our Government and country require, in order to maintain its true position among maritime powers.

Mr. Welles proceeded to explain that great works could not be suddenly called into existence; that they must be in the neighborhood of a bountiful supply of fuel, of iron, and steel, and large numbers of skilled workmen. In his annual report of December, 1862, he renewed his suggestions, saying:

> In March last and again in June I invited the attention of the Naval Committee of Congress to the importance of taking prompt preliminary measures for establishing a navy-yard, including founderies, shops, and docks adapted to the growing wants of the service and the country. It was not that we needed an additional navy-yard, but that we required one of a different character in many respects from any that we possess. In view of the importance of possessing somewhere in this country a navy and dock yard for the purposes of an iron navy, the suggestion of the Department received the favorable consideration of Congress. The city of Philadelphia, the commercial center of the iron and coal region, became interested in the question and was induced to make a free offer of League Island, a body of land of about six hundred acres near the confluence of the Delaware and Schuylkill Rivers, to the United States for naval purposes. In consequence of this liberal offer, Congress authorized the Secretary of the Navy to receive and accept League Island, provided, however, that it should not be accepted until the title shall be perfect to low-water mark, nor if, upon a more thorough examination and survey of the premises by a competent board of officers to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, he shall discover that the public interest will not be promoted by acquiring the title as aforesaid. That the board to be appointed shall, before proceeding to any decision of the questions referred to them, make a survey and examination of the harbor of New London, in Connecticut, and its surroundings, with reference to its fitness for a naval depot and navy-yard, and that they also make the same investigation in regard to the waters of Narraganset Bay.

In pursuance of that resolution a board was appointed from whose report the philosophic but inexperienced gentleman from New York read this morning. The first resolution of that board when it met for action was that in all questions of engineering or which were solvable by engineering the report of the engineer should bind the board, and the result was the unfortunate and unfounded report made by Admiral Stringham, for which, subsequently, I think, every member of the board expressed extreme regret. The result was that the engineer whose interests were centered in one of the other places named instead of boring League Island proper, which is part of the main land and is water-bearing, bored only in the mass of alluvial accretions around the island. Having thus chosen a false field for his tests, he could give a faithful statement of the results of his boring and yet deceive the board. Having given him absolute control of all engineering questions before the board, it could do nothing else than report against it.

Mr. Welles and his able Assistant Secretary, to whom I have alluded, who had had the matter privately examined, rejected the report of the board, appointed a new one, and directed that the borings should be made faithfully over the island, and the results in detail will be found appended to my report; showing that for nearly three hundred acres the land is solid and, as I have said, water-bearing; the wells upon it yielding water at the same depth as they do now in the heart of the great city of which it is a part; that it presented over two hundred and fifty acres of land on which the heaviest machinery could be operated, and offered foundations for the heaviest works or buildings that could be constructed; and the report contains engraved illustrations of the heaviest trip-hammers then known to be in use, and shows that they could be operated without artificial support upon such lands; and the officers to whom the matter was then confided reported in favor of its acceptance, agreeing with the former board that the water of both Narraganset Bay and Winthrop Point was salt, and therefore unfit for an iron naval station. But that in Philadelphia on League Island there was ample land, there was ample wharf-front, and withal there was offing to float our entire Navy. There was also a natural back channel requiring but little dredging and the placing of draw-doors at either end, one on the Schuylkill and the other on the Delaware, to make a basin larger and more commodious than that of Cherbourg that had then recently cost imperial France over $50,000,000 for the basin and shelter-walls alone.

Such is League Island. That part of it is below the water-surface, and protected by embankment, I admit; and I claim it as a very great advantage in view of the extent of the island. More surface has already been prepared for use than the old navy-yard contained. The old yard has been sold for a million dollars. That money is now in the Treasury, and covers quite or nearly all the money the Government has expended in the preparation of that part of the surface of the island, in erecting wharfs, store-houses, workshops, and in re-erecting a large ship-house, the materials of which were removed from the old yard within a few months.

The difficulty in the neighborhood of our great iron and steel works in Pennsylvania is to know what to do with the waste and refuse matter. As you travel through our State you see acres and tens and scores of acres in the vicinity of our great works covered with slag and cinders; and if private parties were to offer to fill League Island to the water-line, it would be a matter of great extravagance on the part of the Government to accept the offer, for with every increasing workshop a demand will arise for a place of deposit for its cinders, slag, and other refuse matter.

By examining the report of the engineers who made the last borings at the island, you will find that the surface even of the accretions is of a tough clay, easily cut when wet and very hard when dry. Mingle that with the earth that must be removed for the foundations of buildings and in the preparation of the docks and yards, and you will have a cement for the slag, cinders, and refuse materials from the shops and buildings that will make, so brief experience has shown, pathways for the heavy wains for carrying materials and armament quite equal to the best Macadamized roads known to the people of Pennsylvania.

If we are to abandon iron-ship building, if we are to say that the timber lands of Maine alone shall supply the material for our future navies, then let us keep Kittery as our chief reliance; because that yard lies as near to the timber lands of Maine as League Island does to the coal and iron fields of Pennsylvania, the forges, the furnaces, the machine-shops, and the millions of skilled workers in coal, iron, and other metals that find their metropolis at Philadelphia.

If, however, with those of other nations our Navy is to carry heavy guns and to resist the heaviest of those of other nations we must have a fresh-water yard; we must have an antidote to the poison of the sea; we must, when war shall again kindle its flame either on our own land or on the oceans that surround us, have the means of bringing into existence in the briefest possible time a great iron navy and all its appointments.

I concur with the Committee on Naval Affairs in its desire to maintain as small a navy in time of peace as is consistent with the dignity of our country, to stimulate in such times the commerce of the country so that when the day of war shall come they who leap from the deck of the merchantman to the deck of the vessel of war may go forth to make our country as she ever has been on the ocean, the victor in the war in which the flag shall be borne. Such being our policy, the necessity of keeping great workshops is apparent, not of keeping them employed; not of maintaining armies of workmen, but of having ever ready the cunning machinery which gives force, speed, and energy to the will and skill of man in constructing matters pertaining to naval warfare.

At League Island we have what reduces Chatham in comparison almost in the same degree that in yonder exhibition, which but a little while ago was spoken of in Congress as a Philadelphia job—in yonder exhibition you have two models, one of the cañon of the Colorado, and beside it, on the same scale, a model of Niagara. As I surveyed them the other day I heard an intelligent New York man beg that the model of the giant waters of Niagara might be removed from such juxtaposition. It was pigmied by the contrast. Two hundred and fifty feet of Niagara against five thousand feet in the walls and dashing waters of the cañon. I say Chatham scanned as a naval station beside the capabilities of League Island would show as Niagara shows compared with the cañon of the Colorado in that wonderful exhibition.

Again, compare League Island with Cherbourg, built up in the ocean, starting for its foundation near the end of the sounding-line. And yet with toil and energy and material resources, year after year, millions of the wealth of the French Empire disappeared under the deep waters, until after more than half a decade there came some to the surface. Now the great naval works of Cherbourg, which fourteen years ago had cost more than $50,000,000, are the only rival France can present to the capabilities of League Island, which cost the Government not one cent, but which I and my constituents and townsmen paid for. We have given you, in return for removing that little yard that obstructed our commerce, a million of dollars, with which you have paid for all the improvements yet made at League Island.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to say again, "I do perceive here a divided duty." If Congress will retrocede that island to Philadelphia they shall have my everlasting thanks. They will save me and the others from Philadelphia who have been my co-laborers in this matter from the denunciations of posterity for having cut off the main river front of our great and beautiful and beloved city.

But under the influence of a broader feeling, under the influence inspired by that flag, under the influence that has made me—let it subject me to what criticism it might—strive by all the means in my power to cement anew the brotherly love of the American people in this centennial year, I cannot but say do not retrocede League Island; do not deprive your country and mine of the possession of the site for the grandest depot that nature has made—for nature made League Island for a depot for naval purposes—and civilized man has yet discovered on the face of the globe.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the delicacy of undertaking to oppose in any of its parts a measure recommended by one of the leading committees of this House; and I would not offer a word of objection to the bill reported by the committee if I did not feel that a sense of duty and propriety required this to be done. In that portion of the bill beginning with line 43 it is provided:

> For the civil establishment at the navy-yards at Brooklyn, New York; League Island, Pennsylvania; Norfolk, Virginia, and Mare Island, California, $80,000; and for the protection and care of the navy-yards not enumerated, $5,000. And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to make inquiry as to the best method of making sale of the navy-yards at Charlestown, Washington, and Pensacola.

I shall at a proper time propose to amend this portion of the bill by inserting after the word "California," in the forty-fifth line, the words "and Pensacola," and by increasing the appropriation in the same line from $80,000 to $100,000. I shall propose to do that for the purpose of keeping Pensacola in its position as one of the navy-yards to be used for repairs, or, if deemed necessary, for repairs and construction. I shall then propose to strike out in line fifty the words "and Pensacola;" so that this navy-yard shall not be included in the list of those in regard to which the Secretary of the Navy is to be directed to make inquiry as to the best method of making sale of them.

In looking into this subject, Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss the question as to the number of navy-yards that there ought to be upon the Atlantic coast. That there ought to be one upon the Gulf of Mexico and one upon the Pacific coast will not, I think, be controverted. We have upon the Gulf coast no private yards in which the war vessels of the Government can be repaired; and in this age of the world we need for the purposes of war not only steam-vessels but iron-clad vessels. In case of war with a foreign power, if one of our vessels in the Gulf squadron should become crippled or disabled in any way, such a vessel, without a navy-yard there for repairing and refitting, would have to be dropped out of service or brought around Cape Sable and up the Atlantic coast to a place where it could be repaired, losing the time of the officers and crew, and taking the perils of such a voyage in a crippled condition in time of war.

In looking at our national necessities I may be excused for calling attention for a moment to that portion of the United States. The Gulf of Mexico may well be termed our American Mediterranean—a great sea in itself. It is from the Atlantic coast of Florida by an air line about two hundred and sixty miles westward to Pensacola. It is from the Atlantic shore of Florida four hundred miles by an air line westward to the Mississippi. It is from the Atlantic shore of Florida seven hundred miles to the western shores of the Gulf of Mexico. It is from Cape Sable westward to Galveston eleven hundred miles and more across the Gulf of Mexico. It is from the mouth of the Mississippi River southward to the southern part of the Gulf of Mexico west of Yucatan eight hundred miles and more, and from Pensacola more than five hundred miles southeast to Cape Sable. I mention this to show the magnitude of that inland sea bounded, on the east by Florida, by the islands of Cuba, Hayti, and the other West Indian Islands, and by the peninsula of Yucatan; on the south by Mexico; on the west by Mexico and Texas; and on the north by Louisiana, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida.

Upon that gulf there is now a large commerce. If the work going on for deepening the mouth of the Mississippi River by the South Pass succeeds, as it is hoped by Mr. Eades, the projector of that great work, it may succeed, and we get twenty-eight feet of water there for the largest class of vessels, the amount of commerce passing out of the great and fertile valley of the Mississippi to the open ocean will be almost incredible. At present it is very large. If the work going on at Galveston shall succeed in giving the depth of water that the United States engineers believe it will give, this commerce will be still further enlarged. There, too, is being concentrated the commerce of the State of Texas, with its present population of a million and a half of people, and with an increase of between 200,000 and 300,000 a year. With the commerce that will go there from the Indian Territory, from Kansas, from New Mexico, from the northern states of the republic of Mexico, a commerce will be centered at the great commercial emporium of what we call the "new west" only less than that which will be poured out of the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Remember that on our entire cost, extending from Cape Sable up the western coast of Florida and along the coast of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas for more than fifteen hundred miles, we have no other naval station or ship-yard than Pensacola. That has a fine depth of water, capable of bearing almost any, perhaps any, vessel in the American Navy. It has a fine harbor and roadstead. It is a fortified position, well secured against danger. It would seem that our national necessities would not be so far overlooked as to destroy this only ship-yard upon that extensive coast.

One thing more I desire to say on this subject. In case of war with a foreign naval power the vulnerable part of the United States is upon the Gulf coast.

A war inaugurated now with Great Britain, with France, or with Spain, unless the mouth of the Mississippi River was protected by a sufficient number of our best monitors, would be as easily ascended by a hostile fleet of war vessels as it was by the Federal fleet during our recent intestine war. It will be remembered that Fort Saint Philip, Fort Jackson, and other batteries along the shores of the Mississippi were not sufficient to stay the progress of a fleet composed in part at least of wooden vessels.

The commerce of the Mississippi Valley deserves and needs protection; and when I speak of this commerce I do not mean to be understood as speaking alone of the commerce of the country bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, for it is likewise the commerce of Louisiana, of Arkansas, of Mississippi, of Tennessee, of Kentucky, of Missouri, and of all the rich States which lie between the Ohio and Mississippi and to the west of the Mississippi, which finds its way to market by means of that unequaled channel of commerce. Protection, therefore, is necessary.

Galveston, the other point I mentioned standing second in commercial importance to New Orleans upon the Gulf, is in such condition to-day that war vessels could bombard and destroy the city and its commerce.

I have not spoken of Mobile, Brashear, Sabine Pass, Indianola, Corpus Christi, and the other towns which lie upon the border of this great inland sea. All of them in case of war would be exposed to the ravages of an enemy and incalculable injury could be done to us, for many of them are to-day without a particle of protection. Even Galveston to-day has not a single gun mounted, and a single step has not yet been taken to protect it in case of war against a hostile fleet.

What would the consequence be if we should be drawn into war, which we all trust may not happen? For, sir, we cannot take to ourselves the assurance that we shall be exempt from war. Our Government occupies a position which makes it necessary that it should deal with all the great questions which interest the nationalties of the earth. It must take its responsibility in disposing of these great questions. It should direct its commercial policy to more intimate relations with Mexico, the Central American and South American states, so that, instead of manufactures from other countries supplying those countries, they should come from New England or the Middle States. It seems to me there is no reason why, under a wise, prudent, and proper policy, we should not control the vast trade of those countries, very little of which we control at this time. In our intercourse with them, which must grow and increase, we stand liable to complications. We have seen that we were liable to be drawn into difficulty on account of the trouble in the island of Cuba. We cannot tell but danger may be on us at almost any moment. It is at least prudent in time of peace to make reasonable and needful preparations for war. That preparation may avert what might otherwise fall upon us.

A great power like this, having its commercial relations with the whole civilized world, needs and must have a navy. It should have one that would command for the Government that respect due to one of the first powers of the earth. If we have such a navy we must provide for building ships of war and for repairing them. I have heard it suggested in conversation that this might be done at private ship-yards. As vessels of war are now built we can hardly expect, even in our progressive, go-ahead country, to find private ship-yards that will prepare such iron, and in such quantities, as will be necessary for the construction of great iron war steamers. If we are to have these, they must be made by the Government, at least in large part. In this connection let me read an extract from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, in 1866:

For the construction of iron and armored vessels, it can only be repeated that although our country has the material in great abundance, and possesses many advantages in that regard, we are almost wholly unprepared. In future maritime wars the contests between the great naval powers for supremacy on the ocean will be determined chiefly by iron-clad or armored ships. Our turreted vessels or monitors will be powerful and effective for harbor and coast defense, but in conflict with any European power our countrymen will hardly be content with mere defensive warfare.

Armored vessels for ocean cruising must necessarily be of large size, which cannot, with the requisite strength, be secured in wooden structures. If attempted, the immense masses of timber must rapidly decay, and the cost resulting from deterioration will be such as no economical and prudent nation will consent to sustain. Ships for cruising and offensive operations must be such as can use sails, for no vessel can long keep the sea under steam alone. Such vessels as are here suggested should be built at a Government establishment, for though private enterprise can do much in aid of the Navy, the peculiarities of iron vessels for naval purposes are such that private parties cannot undertake the work unless at prices which will cover all the outlay for the establishment as well as the vessel, for there can be no other customer than the Government for such work.

In this view of the subject it is plainly the interest of the Government to erect its own shops and machinery, and to possess its own establishment for the construction of its iron and armored naval vessels. Several years of preparation will be required to provide the necessary appliances for such an establishment, and a special and convenient location, with ample area, should be promptly selected. In each of the navy-yards a dry-dock is indispensable, and for a steam navy there should be suitable shops and accommodations for the repair of vessels.

I read this much from the report of Secretary Welles of 1866 on the point as to the necessity of Government navy-yards possessing the peculiar machinery necessary to the building of ships of war such as are used in modern times. While I have this report in my hand, I will also read an extract from it in regard to the navy-yard at Pensacola. After going on at some length, reasoning upon the necessity for establishing the navy-yards at Norfolk and Pensacola, he uses this language:

The suppression of the rebellion and the re-establishment of that peace and unity which constitute us one country and one people make it a duty to restore these national establishments to their former efficient condition. In so far as there was reason during the rebellion for refusing to do this, because insurrection prevailed in the region where the yards are situated, that reason no longer exists. True, the expenditures will be made in States which were in rebellion, but the rebellion has passed away, the States are parts of the Union, and the establishments which are to be renovated are national in their character and of general interest to a l. Upon the Pensacola yard, even in its present ruinous state, we must depend for repairs and supplies for any squadron we may employ to guard the ocean outlet of the great central valley of the Union and of our whole coast bordering on the Gulf. To neglect to put that yard in proper condition would be to neglect Iowa, Illinois, and the States north, as well as Louisiana and Mississippi.

In the event of a foreign war with the great maritime powers, our country would labor under serious disadvantages were we without a navy-yard or naval station in the Gulf. A naval force of steamers—and all fighting-vessels must hereafter be steamers—could not be maintained in the Gulf without frequent repairs and supplies. With no navy-yard in the Gulf, the disabled vessels would necessarily be withdrawn from their station and compelled to proceed to a northern yard for refitment. Besides, the perils incident to a voyage under these circumstances, with an enemy on the coast, the services of the officers and crews, as well as of the vessel itself, would be lost during the time she might be absent in going to and returning from a northern yard. The rebels and the waste of war have devastated the Norfolk and Pensacola yards, but the best interest of the service and the obligations of the Government are not less imperative now, when peace and union are restored, to place them in proper condition. It is to be hoped, therefore, that liberal appropriations will be made for that purpose.

While reading extracts from official sources, I will call attention to what is said by the present Secretary of the Navy in his last annual report in regard to the Pensacola navy-yard. He says:

During the past year the old hospital-building within the walls of the yard has been torn down and destroyed, and a new hospital erected upon the ruins of one without the walls, destroyed during the war.

While it is not deemed wise to place this yard in condition for building ships, yet it is considered eminently proper that it should possess all requisite facilities for docking and repairing the vessels of the North Atlantic squadron. Several additional buildings are necessary, and estimates are submitted for another timber-shed and a machine-shop for steam-engineering.

It is hoped that two sections of the iron sectional dock for this navy-yard will be finished during the present fiscal year.

Therefore the last report that comes from the Secretary of the Navy sustains the one made several years ago by Secretary Welles as to the importance and necessity of preserving that navy-yard, at least for repairs and supplies. It may be matter for future determination how far construction shall go on there. Two vessels of war at least were built there in former times. In addition to the necessity of a naval station and navy-yard for the repair and supply of vessels on that vast inland sea for the protection of our coast cities and great commerce, it may be said in relation to Pensacola that in addition to its fine, capacious, and secure harbor and deep water, it lies in the finest timber region on the Atlantic waters. The supplies of live-oak to all the navy-yards of the country come from Florida, and I was going to say from Texas, but I am not sure of that. But in Florida and on the coast of Texas along the Colorado and Lower Brazos are vast supplies of live-oak timber. In Southeastern Texas, back of the Sabine Pass, on the Sabine and Natches Rivers, there are almost limitless amounts of as fine white oak as grows on the continent. And many years ago I was told by a gentleman who had made an examination of the fine pine regions bordering these two rivers lying back of the Sabine Pass that even then, since the pine had been cut as it was in Maine and in Florida, the finest timber for spars and masts was to be found in Eastern Texas. So that you have the live-oak and white oak if needed, and the finest timber for masts and spars on the Atlantic waters close around Pensacola.

In addition to this, there are mines of coal and iron up the Alabama River now being developed in limitless quantities at a convenient distance from Pensacola. The means of transportation for the coal and iron which go down the Mississippi River to Pensacola are such that they may be carried there with great ease and facility and cheapness; so that they have all the materials necessary for the repair or construction and supply of ships. I see, therefore, no reason why that place should not be considered as occupying a commanding position for a navy-yard.

The suggestion has been made that Pensacola is subject to occasional visitations of yellow fever, and that in the prevalence of that disease the workmen may have to abandon their post of duty. It is true that all the towns and cities upon that coast are occasionally subject to visitations of yellow fever. But it is proper for me to say that in a period of fifteen years at least—and some more, I think, may be added to that, but I will not undertake to say precisely how many from memory—that city has only been twice visited by yellow fever.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It never originates there.

Mr. FINLEY. It is always imported.

Mr. REAGAN. Two gentlemen near me suggest that it never originates there and is always imported. Proper quarantine regulations will at all times protect that place against yellow fever.

But the time which might be lost, it may be once in five years or so, by the workmen at that yard for that reason, will not be equal to the loss of time sustained in the cold regions of the North, where our navy-yards are, because of frost and snow. With the exception of such danger as may exist from this source there is nothing at all in the way at any time or at any season of the year to impede the work of construction and repairs going on at that navy-yard.

It will not do to say that because the people of that region are sometimes subject to the scourge of the yellow fever—and I understand from physicians that in modern times it has modified somewhat its type, and possesses less terror for the people than formerly—it should be remembered that our country is there, our people are there, our commerce and trade are there, our national honor is pledged as much to the protection of that people and that commerce as it is to the protection of any other portion of the American people and the American commerce. Where our people live, where they rear their families, where they make their homes in the sunny lands of the South as happily as elsewhere, surely the officers and employés of the Government can live.

I say this in order to meet that argument if it be suggested. It has just as much force as I have indicated, and no more. It will not do to say that that country must be abandoned to its fate; that the commerce of the vast region of country that pours into the Gulf of Mexico is in case of war to be left at the mercy of the enemy because sometimes there may be yellow fever at Pensacola where our navy-yard is.

I have said this much because I feel that in proposing to strike out so much of the appropriation as is necessary to keep in existence the navy-yard at Pensacola the committee have made a great mistake. The national interest, the national honor, and the national peace demand that it shall not be done.

The Committee on Naval Affairs make a different recommendation, but we are not now dealing with their report. It recommends, as I understand, in conformity with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, that the Pensacola navy-yard shall be preserved for repairs and supplies. If we make no appropriation for it, the law leaves it, without the means of carrying it on, in such a condition that the yard must go to destruction, and the vast amount of money that has already been expended there must be lost, the national defense must suffer, and in the event of war the commerce of our country must be unprotected to an extent that I am not now fully prepared to show. I have said this for the purpose of calling the attention of the Committee of the Whole this evening to the subject, so that when the proper time arrives I may offer the necessary amendment to preserve this navy-yard as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy and by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Chairman, the portion of this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the committee to-night will be found on page third, relating to the civil establishments at the navy-yards at Brooklyn, League Island, Norfolk, and Mare Island: directing the Secretary of the Navy to ascertain and report as to the best method of making sale of the navy-yards at Charlestown, Washington, and Pensacola, the recession of the naval station at New London, and the establishment of a naval rendezvous at Tybee Island or Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia. It is briefly to this portion of the bill that I wish to direct the attention of the Committee of the Whole. I speak as a representative of the section immediately and greatly interested in one or more of the provisions of this portion of the bill making appropriations for the naval establishment in the opening year.

Mr. Chairman, it comes to us in an unexpected and unusual form. Here is an appropriation bill, which ordinarily contains only the specific appropriations required by existing law, appropriations of specific sums demanded by existing laws for carrying on the Government or in anticipation of measures now pending and that are probably to become laws during the present session. That is the ordinary function of the Committee on Appropriations, and that is the anticipated result of their labors. But in this bill, in the provisions to which I have referred, we find an entirely new theory of legislation.

For example, under the rules of the House matters relating to the naval establishment of the country would ordinarily be referred to a committee composed of gentlemen representing different sections and acquainted with that interest. And all these matters have in fact been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and the House is now waiting for its conclusion and report. And now, while yet waiting the conclusion of the committee constituted for that purpose, the Committee on Appropriations, in ten or a dozen lines of this bill, proposes to sweep away even the very foundation of that establishment. Although two or three points only are named in this portion of the bill which are to be abolished or destroyed, it may occur that the House itself or this committee first and the House may add other locations to those already named and thus the very foundations of the naval establishment may be abolished, and so in a week or two, so far as the House is concerned, we may find little or nothing left upon which the Navy Department can rest.

I wish to speak in the first instance against this method of legislation. There is nothing that has ever been proposed or that can be conceived so fatal to honest legislation as that which allows all the subjects of the ordinary legislation of a session to be fastened upon appropriation bills, with special and exclusive privileges that are never accorded to the legislative measures referred to or reported by any other committee whatever, and which are not given even to bills providing appropriations to carry into effect existing and long-established laws. The utmost privilege ever accorded to an appropriation bill is that of being reported at any time; but this practice permits any measure, whatever may be the subject to which it relates or however important the changes it works in existing laws, to be made without notice and forced to a conclusive and final vote at the time it is proposed. It gives to the Appropriation Committee the power to scoop into its hopper the work of every committee and every topic of legislation of whatever name or nature. This is in contravention of every principle of parliamentary law. Appropriation bills have been restricted by immemorial usage and practice to the legitimate and limited purposes and objects, not of legislation, but of specific or general appropriations of public money necessary to the execution of established laws. If this were a reform legislature, and intending to make a reform in the general legislation and condition of the country—and I am one of those that concede earnestly and willingly that reform is demanded by all parties and all sections of the country—if this House of Representatives intended to do this, then it has committed a fundamental and fatal error. No such mischievous rule of legislation, no such vicious system of political action, was ever devised or proposed as that which we have established here, if it be admitted that it gives to the Committee on Appropriations the opportunity to ingraft upon its bills all the legislation that its members may think just and proper, I will not say to usurp, but to assume jurisdiction and final control of the duties of almost every other committee of the House.

It is impossible for us to reform the abuses of the Government, it is utterly out of human power to have an honest administration or an honest government if this system of legislation to which I am referring shall become the established and recognized system of national legislation. It would not surprise me at all if we should find the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which the rules of the House have committed the duty of considering and reporting upon everything that pertains to the naval establishment of the country, seeking through its chairman and through the chairmen of its subcommittees—humbly seeking at the hands of the Committee on Appropriations an opportunity to offer the results of their deliberations and investigations as amendments to this bill.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, whether it has done its work well or ill I cannot say, has certainly prosecuted its inquiries with great industry, and has brought together a mass of information such as never has been presented to the country before in regard to the naval establishment, which has presented and will present in the end many volumes not only of interesting but of instructive testimony from the most honest and intelligent men in different parts of the country whose lives have been connected with the service—all this labor will have been wasted, if not lost, because the Committee on Appropriations assumes the right to take away the very basis upon which the Committee on Naval Affairs has predicated its labors.

If this policy shall be fastened upon the Government as an established rule of action, we may bid farewell forever to any chance or opportunity of making an honest administration of the Government. It does not matter whether it fall into the hands of republicans, democrats, or independents; no party and no people will be able to conduct the affairs of this Government independently or honestly, with a just and proper regard to its various interests, where such unlimited and unrestricted power is given to a single committee as has been given by our action in this case to the Committee on Appropriations. Should it be perpetuated, it will be a measure more fatal to honest legislation than any legacy ever bequeathed by the members of one Congress to the members of another. So much for the manner in which this subject is presented.

Let us look, then, at the question itself. The committee proposes to sell one, two, or three of the establishments which are known to the country as navy-yards. It is a mere chance that Charlestown or Pensacola or League Island or Mare Island are mentioned. These are designated, and we may, if we concur in the action of the committee, destroy them, simply because the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations happen to be from sections of the country which have no especial interest in these particular establishments. If I were upon the Committee on Appropriations, of course you understand that I would not propose a measure which would destroy the navy-yard at Charlestown. There would be no dishonesty, no impropriety in my acting in the view which I have expressed, because very naturally, being from that section and knowing its capacity, I should then think it most unwise, as I do now think it is most unwise, most injudicious, and even criminal, speaking of it as a measure of administrative policy, to destroy that and possibly some other navy-yards that are herein mentioned.

The gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who has spoken so ably and with so much reason against the abolition of the navy-yard at Pensacola, could not be supposed to have been inclined, or to have consented under any circumstances whatever, to the destruction of that yard if he had been upon the Committee on Appropriations, simply because being from that section of the Republic he would have appreciated its importance, and for that reason would have been disinclined to consent to its destruction.

Therefore any of the recommendations which we have from that committee depend not so much upon the merits of the particular propositions that are presented as upon the accidental location and residence of the members of the committee. Of course I do not intend to criticise or condemn the action of its members in this respect any more than I would condemn my own action if I were a member of the committee and had stood by the navy-yard at Charlestown instead of proposing to abolish it, as it is now proposed to do.

This certainly is not a wise method or principle of legislative action. A matter of this kind ought not to be presented to us either as a matter of privilege or of chance, giving to the committee that proposes it authority to suspend all the rules of the House by a majority vote and insert within its provisions any subjects of legislation without limitation or restriction, provided only that it contains an argumentative or presumed reduction of expenditures, and to press them to a final determination in a few hours. In the case before the committee, four hours of the time allowed for general debate were last evening given to the discussion of matters entirely disconnected from the principles or measures embraced in the naval appropriation bill.

It ought not to be given to a committee to make these fundamental changes in the legislation of the country and in the administrative establishments of the Government under such advantages, and thus deprive us of the opportunity of a full and clear examination and discussion of them upon their merits. I do not make any criticism at all upon the committee; it does not enter into my mind to utter one word of censure upon the committee for what they have done. I only speak of the influence and effect of the position which they occupy in this regard and the new and perilous practice we have established in the legislation of the country.

Let us then revert to the immediate question before the committee. What is it? It is to sell two or three, and in the end it may be all the navy-yards now owned by the Government. It is true that the language of the bill proposes to restrict the Secretary of the Navy to an inquiry as to the expediency and best method of selling the yards named. But this presupposes the expediency or necessity of selling them. Its effect upon the country and upon foreign nations will be the same as an order to sell, and it might result in their sale without imposing either upon Congress or the Navy Department any proper responsibility for such an important step. And why, if there is to be an inquiry should it be limited to the establishments here named? Why should it not embrace all yards wherever located, and give to the commission authority to examine all and report those that could best be spared and those which it would be most beneficial for the Government to retain? Why should not the whole question be submitted to the Navy Department? Indeed this ought to be the instruction given to the Secretary, if we give him any instruction upon this subject. If we mean merely to instruct the Secretary of the Navy to inquire what naval establishments can be dispensed with, we ought to leave the whole matter to him or the commission he may appoint. The proposition should not embrace merely the navy-yards at Charlestown, Pensacola, and the Pacific coast. Let him have the whole matter. If there is to be any inquiry, let the whole subject go to this commission or to the Secretary of the Navy, who knows what sort of men to appoint in order to give this House at the next session the full opportunity to examine the whole question. Why should we, upon a pretense that we do not take any action at all, deprive the Secretary of the Navy effectually of the opportunity of considering whether one-half of the existing naval establishments are worth retaining or whether they are not? Why should we not open the whole field to him? I trust that if this committee should do anything on this question it will, when it comes to that point, give unlimited instructions to the Secretary of the Navy to inquire whether any one or all of these establishments should be abolished. At present the proposition is in fact and effect an order to sell certain yards specifically named, reserving an inquiry only as to the best method of making the sale. This ought not to be, and I hope will not be, done.

Now what is it that we propose to do? To sell land. If the Government were an individual sixty or seventy years of age, likely to die in three or five months or years, and having heirs among whom its property was to be distributed, or intending to give it to some charitable institution, then it might be very well to settle up affairs in this way, to convert the lands into bonds or money, and put the proceeds where they would do the most good. But, sir, the Government is not in this condition. This Government is here, not for months or years, but for centuries. It is here for a thousand years. Why should it sell its land? Why should it sell the best position in Boston harbor? Why should it sell the military and naval position it owns at Pensacola? Why, above all, should it sell that position on the Pacific coast where after scientific deliberation and investigation it has planted its naval establishment? What is to be gained by it?

Sir, what member of the committee is able to tell us what will be the necessities of the Government in five years or ten years or twenty-five years at any one of these points? There are on the borders of the Pacific Ocean 500,000,000 people, a power whose ultimate development and destiny is beyond the comprehension of man. Nobody knows what it is to be in the future. Nobody knows what effect it will have upon this country. Why should we tie up our hands at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Navy or a commission appointed by him and deprive ourselves of the key-points upon the Pacific coast which ultimately are to confront and control the movements of that part of the world, the most populous of all portions of the globe, embracing in fact half its entire population? Who can tell us what will be the ultimate effect of the sale of the land which the Government now owns and has appropriated to the natural defenses of the Pacific coast?

Mr. Chairman, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) you are a wise man, of large experience, having known something of the course of local as well as general administration. Did you ever know a university, for example, or a charitable corporation having a little apparently unimportant land given to it by benevolent persons for benevolent purposes, that being spurred on by thoughtless and unreflecting men into parting with it as soon as it got it upon the supposition that it was good for nothing and that the institution did not need it—did you ever know one such institution that did not find after twenty-five or fifty or one hundred years that the whole of its influence or its very existence was dependent upon getting back that land or its equivalent in money, if it could? Look at Harvard University; look at any university, or any other institution of learning or charity, that has parted with its lands in that way, and see what the effect has been. We are acting here just as if we were a community that had not more than ten or fifteen years' lease of life given to it, and that it was, therefore, necessary to close up its affairs. But it is not so. We are acting for a people that are to endure a thousand years, for many thousand years it may be; and every step that we take in regard to parting with these key-positions of the continent may be fatal to our people and our country hereafter. Sir, it is a crime that I trust we shall not commit.

We come, then, to the Charlestown navy-yard, now embraced within the new limits of the city of Boston. There was a time when the city of Boston might have been benefited by the sale of this land, but it is not now. Boston originally had six hundred acres of land—no more for a hundred years; and I do not know how much longer it occupied but six hundred acres of land; and until within four or five years past it never covered more than three thousand acres of land. It has reclaimed more than two thousand acres from the sea. Boston is a city set upon sticks. Men have gone out into the deep water, driven their piles, and brought in their filling, and made the land. It is their creation. It has cost millions and tens of millions of dollars to furnish a foundation for the city of Boston and to make it what it is, a city of which this country ought to be proud, a city which in any aspect, whether you consider its social influence, its intellectual character, the advantages of its location, the beauty of its architecture, its beneficent influence upon education, art, society, and government, its contributions to commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, its part in the creation of the great arteries of transportation and communication by sea and land, its sacrifices for universal liberty, and its general industry and prosperity, is unsurpassed by any city on the face of the earth. These people have reclaimed the city they occupy from the deep sea. From six hundred acres of land they have made it, in point of intellectual, æsthetic, and moral influence, one of the noblest cities of the globe.

Now, sir, a navy-yard long ago was planted on the other side of the bay opposite the city of Boston. It is high land; Bunker Hill overtops the tri-mountain city. It is planted upon deep water; no dredging or piling there. It is the best part of Boston harbor. There is no commercial or naval position which can rival or surpass the advantages which commercial or naval vessels enjoy at the Charlestown navy-yard.

If Boston could have planted itself on that side of the harbor instead of the three mountains it now occupies, it would long ago have embraced millions of acres within its jurisdiction without disturbing the surface or soundings of the deep sea. But fortune decided otherwise. The Government in the end came to occupy that advantageous position which Boston had so long coveted. It was obtained at a very reasonable cost. It has served a good purpose. No discredit attaches to the location or its institutions. The adjacent and surrounding communities have grown up with it and adapted themselves to it. They have prospered together. They are all necessary to the Government and the prosperity of the people. Why should the Government now separate them? Why should Boston, that has been compelled to recover from the deep sea the very land upon which she stands, be deprived of the local and general advantages it has so long enjoyed from her intimate and honorable connections with the Government, in peace and war, at that point for more than three-fourths of a century? Why should we sell this land? Are we to make any money by it? When we sell land we do not get the money that we pay when we buy it. If the Government sells the navy-yard at the city of Boston within twenty-five years it will pay a million dollars for other lands for every thousand it receives for this land. Is there to be no navy-yard on the New England coast? Is there any better position elsewhere? Why, then, should we sell them to buy again? What is to be gained by it and who advises it?

There are eighty acres now occupied there for the various purposes of a naval establishment. It costs the Government nothing as a property; it costs the prosperous and busy communities nothing by which it is surrounded; it is no expense to anybody. Taxes are of no account and the interest upon the money the land is worth is of no account, because neither taxes nor interest run against the Government. If sold it will only take the place of other lands upon which interest and taxes are now paid, and neither the State nor the General Government will be richer or stronger for the change; and after ten or twenty years the Government will buy it back, or some other land, and pay a million dollars for every thousand it gets if it sells it now. Just so it is with Pensacola and just so it is with the station on the Pacific coast. Even taking League Island at the reputation it bears here with those most opposed to it, admitting that it is half under water, if the Government has got it and owns it the Government had better keep it. If the city of Philadelphia had looked to its own interest and regarded less the interest and the welfare of the Government it never would have allowed League Island to pass out of its jurisdiction. Although I never set eyes upon it and know nothing about it but what has been said here, I know that, if it is land near the city of Philadelphia and the Government owns it, it is good property, and the day the Government sells it they will that day and that hour begin to wish they could buy it back again. So with every one of these places. They were chosen by wise men. They were not mere territorial purchases for local and temporary objects. They were chosen by wise men who knew the principles upon which the Government must be defended. They were selected as the key-points of the continent for this purpose.

Now it is proposed to this committee and House to sell them. Why do you sell them now? Who is selling landed property now? In the country where I live, among industrious and frugal mechanics, a man who bought a house five years ago for $1,000 and has a mortgage for $500 on it, if he should sell it for the best he could get and pay the mortgage he would find that he had lost his property and was saddled with a debt a hundred dollars or more besides. It is so everywhere. Real estate sells for less than half its former value. Is this, then, a time for us to go into the market with acres of land, most valuable for defense and for business, and force it upon an unwilling people, who have no disposition to buy and nothing to pay with?

Then in regard to the yard at Charlestown or Boston. Let me ask you who owns it? The Government of the United States, for the purpose of a navy-yard; but it is the general belief among the people best acquainted with it that some portion of the land at least was sold or given to the Government specifically for a navy-yard, and that this portion, whatever it may be, would revert to heirs who are said not to be in this country, and who may have already parted with their reversionary interest to those who may be among those urging the Government to sell. I have made diligent inquiry on this subject within the last few hours, since it was brought up here, but have not been able to find any proof of this allegation. But it is the general belief of the people of Charlestown. The counsel of the Government admitted it in the hearing concerning the East Boston bridge. I know perfectly well it is their belief that there are heirs living in England who have a reversionary interest in this land, if it be abandoned for the purpose of a navy-yard. Are gentlemen ready to sell this land under such circumstances for probably less than a third of its value?

Admitting all that is said by the honorable gentlemen who presented this question to the committee as to the excessive debts, the gigantic taxes, and the doubtful future of the country—admitting all, confessing that our condition is even worse than they have stated, as I believe it to be—admitting all that, is there no remedy but the sale of the public property, and especially the landed property, these key-points of the continent, essential to the defense of the country as well as to the maintenance of its commerce? No, sir; there are other means for the recuperation of the industry and the restoration of the prosperity and the revival of the ancient integrity which distinguished our people and its Government. And one of these means, ay, Mr. Chairman, the only one—there is no other and there never will be any other—is to bring every subject of legislation regularly and in order before the House, that it may be examined before it is acted upon, that we may know in advance when it is to be considered, that we may enjoy a reasonable opportunity to study the reports of the committee presenting it, and one after the other move upon these questions and dispose of them understandingly, honestly, and consistently with the interests of the country. That is the best and only method of recuperation, so far as legislation is concerned; and if the honorable gentlemen who have undertaken the management of the affairs of this House, and, so far as this House is concerned, of the Government itself, will adopt this method of legislation they will give a joy to the people that they have not known for many a year. But if you seek to restore their prosperity and to revive their exhausted energies by the forced and unrequited sale of the key-points of the continent, the land we have obtained for the defense of our commerce and our honor, to those who do not want it and have nothing to pay for it, to buy again when it is gone a larger territory at a higher price, then, sir, we shall be disappointed in the result and the people will have reason to withdraw the confidence they have bestowed upon us.

So much, sir, for that. Now what is all this for? Yes, sir; what is it all about? Well, I do not know. But here [turning to page 3 of the bill] is a suspicious and dark-looking low-decked schooner, with rakish masts and narrow beams, as if built for speed rather than strength, her prow directed toward "a naval rendezvous" at Tybee Island or at Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia, "a naval rendezvous" that at present at least has no existence. Now, sir, is there any necessity for establishing this "naval rendezvous" in the State of Georgia? If we are so destitute and desperate that we must sell the Pacific coast, Bunker Hill, the defensive positions of the Gulf of Mexico, and every prominent point in the country heretofore identified with greater men and greater events even than those with whom we have been associated; if there is any imperative and immediate necessityfor the "naval rendezvous" in the neighborhood of Tybee and Cockspur Islands in order that this suspicious craft that I thought I saw in the offing silently and even stealthily moving in the direction of the State of Georgia may find it, could we not wait a little? Is it possible that the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who presents this bill, has no other conception in regard to it than that it is to lead to a new "naval rendezvous" in the State of Georgia?

They may say it is only "a rendezvous!" What is a rendezvous? It is a place where there is a general meeting for general and well-understood purposes; and if League Island, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania says has the incomparable advantage of being half under water—if League Island is an advantage to the country that requires an appropriation of forty or fifty million dollars hereafter, what security have we that this "rendezvous" at Cockspur, or Tybee Islands, in the State of Georgia, may not cost the Government in the next twenty-five years forty or fifty million dollars more? Will the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who reported this bill, give us a guarantee, backed by his unquestioned responsibility, that the Government shall be put to no cost by this? Why, sir, should we be required to strike down Bunker Hill, to sell it to the enemy it may possibly be, in order to establish such a rendezvous at Cockspur, or Tybee Islands, in the State of Georgia?

There was a man named John Adams, a citizen of Massachusetts, associated as Vice-President with George Washington, and the second President of the United States. It is to Mr. Adams we owe the foundation of our Navy. There were among public men in this country in his time, as now, many who did not greatly admire a naval system, and did not much encourage the foundation of a naval establishment, for very good reasons, no doubt. But Mr. Adams, having fixed his resolute and determined mind upon the idea of a naval establishment, had the strength to bring Congress and the people of the country to support it; and one of the earliest naval stations was fixed at Charlestown, in the State of Massachusetts, now a prosperous and flourishing part of the city of Boston.

Why did they take Charlestown for one of the first navy-yards? Because, sir, it was in a section of country where the people first gave their attention to the sea. In the State-house at Boston, in the house of representatives, a house unlike this, where the natural light and air of heaven sometimes enter, where the sentiments of the people are well and truly represented, just in front of the speaker, as if waiting an opportunity to do that which we all most diligently seek to do—to catch the Speaker's eye at important moments—there hangs, swimming in air, the well-mounted effigy of a gigantic codfish, suggesting the origin and giving a typical representation of what is called there "the codfish aristocracy." It is kept constantly in the eye of legislators to admonish them that they owe their prosperity, their liberty, and their honor to the codfish and the deep-sea fisheries. It was no vulgar origin; there is many an aristocrat in this and other countries who has not as respectable an ancestry as that. The codfish was the original source not only of their means of sustenance but the basis of the industry and commerce of that portion of the country in its early settlement and ultimately in no inconsiderable measure of the whole country.

In the ancient and honorable town of Medford, of the district which I represent, and but two or three miles from Charlestown, was launched one of the first vessels built on this continent. The Dutch people in New York and the southern people in Virginia built other vessels about the same time, it may be a little earlier or a little later. But certainly one of the earliest and best vessels built on the Atlantic coast was constructed by the colonists at Medford in 1630 or 1631, and named, with religious ceremonies and with the prayers of the people, "The Blessing of the Bay." It was the blessing of the bay. It brought them sustenance and kept them alive. Little by little they grew so as to be able to chase and capture a nobler game. They followed the whale into Hudson Bay and the northern oceans. Their chivalrous and triumphant chase of this gigantic game of the sea drew from Edmund Burke that most remarkable and eloquent meed of praise which he bestowed upon the people of New England for the success of their whaling industry.

A little later the vessels that had been built upon the Atlantic coast found their way into the Indian Ocean, and carried the manufactures of Massachusetts into the crowded empires of the East, where by their superiority they drove the English manufactures out of the eastern markets. They owed to that little vessel built at Medford, in the neighborhood of the navy-yard at Charlestown—that little vessel which they reverently and wisely called The Blessing of the Bay—all their prosperity and power. It was the offspring of that vessel that forced upon the world American cottons, and which in turn gave to the cotton States a market for their staple product. We put more of the raw material, which was abundant, into the product of our looms than English manufacturers could give, and it secured for us the markets so essential to our manufacturing industry and to the increase of the cotton crop. It was "The Blessing of the Bay" that did it.

At a later period it was the means of establishing the ice trade, taking an article which nobody believed could ever be of any value whatever, and making it as well the basis of an extended and prosperous commerce and a source of revenue to the State and a blessing to all nations. William Gray, Theodore Lyman, Frederick Tudor, and other merchants, who were the precursors of Francis Lowell and the mechanics associated with him in the organization of the American system of manufactures, must forever be numbered among the founders of the commercial and industrial prosperity of the country. It was no doubt in part for these reasons, as well as on account of the advantages of its situation, that John Adams and the patriots of that day selected Charlestown, in the vicinage of Boston, as the site of one of the earliest of our navy-yards. It had the best water; it was upon high and rising ground; it was in the midst of a prosperous and industrious people; they found there the best shipwrights in the world and the best sailors that ever plowed the sea.

The first Napoleon paid only a just compliment to New England sailors when he said that while Frenchmen were the best soldiers that ever stood upon the land, the Americans were the best sailors that ever floated upon the sea. The sailors of Marblehead, who are represented by my friend here of the Gloucester district, [Mr. THOMPSON,] gave chase to British cruisers and captured them in the very mouth of the British Channel.

The mechanics of the navy-yard at Charlestown built the Constitution and the Guerriere and the thirty or forty vessels which carried our flag triumphantly over every sea during the great struggle with Great Britain, a struggle that no infant state like ours ever before made with such success against a power that had never before been measured and conquered, a State which Mr. Webster correctly and truly described when he said that "it was a power to which Rome in the days of her glory was unequal, whose morning-drum beat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, encircled the earth daily with one continuous strain of the martial airs of England."

The mechanics of that neighborhood built the Constitution and the Guerriere and the other majestic floating batteries that humbled the power of Great Britain upon the sea. They were built by mechanics who were residents, rulers, and defenders of the little communities of the Atlantic coast ranging all the way from Maine to New York, and farther south, if you please, to Virginia and the Carolinas and Georgia. It was for such reasons that Charlestown had been selected and is yet maintained as the site of one of the best navy-yards to be found in any part of the world.

Now, what has Charlestown done that she should be deprived of the memento left of those glorious days and great men? Look at her history. It might be deemed perhaps invidious to recall even the names of its citizens who were among the chief figures in the moving panorama of the world during the hundred years just closed. There were Lexington, Concord, and Charlestown within a circle whose radius is less than five miles. Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill! Who can forget them? Who can cease to remember what we owe to the men whose patriotism and prowess have led to the glories which we now enjoy in common with the rest of the world?

Shall we strip Bunker Hill of that establishment which was intended as a memento and monument of earlier enterprise and success and the instrument of later if not greater achievements? Shall we deprive Lexington and Concord of this honorable recognition of past services which the Government of the United States gave to this section three-quarters of a century ago because it deserved it and could best use it? I think this committee will scarcely do that. No, sir; let Bunker Hill stand; let her try her chances and test her destiny, whatever it may be, in the century that is to come. Let her contemplate what she has been and what she is, and not be made to hang her head with shame when she remembers that an American House of Representatives, the first parliamentary assembly in the world, has deprived her of the recognition of patriotic services and the chaplet of honor that our fathers accorded her. Let those now engaged in labor for their bread and that of their children for weary hours at stinted pay bear constantly in sight the flag which floats above them, a perpetual reminder of the glories of the past and the hopes of the future; of the virtues of their fathers and their mothers; for there were then mothers as well as fathers of the country.

I am sure I need not ask the committee to consider well what will be the effect of any such action as this. Sir, my heart would pour itself out in tears if I believed that while I was a member of this House its honorable Speaker would ever be called upon to append his name to a bill which should be a chart of dishonor for Bunker Hill; and for what? For a few dollars in irredeemable currency as a compensation for land improvidently sold, which no man can say will be worth twenty-five cents on the dollar five or ten years hence. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, you may think this is a mere expression of local or personal feeling; that my sincerity and warmth are not natural and sincere. But it is an error. Sir, in the twenty years I have been off and on a member of this House, I have often spoken in moments of great excitement when strong appeals were made. I have seen incidents and events that were calculated to blanche with fear the cheeks of the boldest and bravest men. I have been called to speak honest words, sometimes of denunciation, sometimes of argument, sometimes of appeal. But never in any moment did I speak upon a subject or an occasion that more closely touched the inner recesses of my heart than now, when I appeal to the committee for the honor of Bunker Hill, Lexington, and Concord, identified with the best days and the best men and the greatest events of our history or the history of the world. I speak not merely for the people of the New England villages, a few hundred men and women, but the people all around, the descendants of the "embattled farmers" who with their muskets upon their shoulders stepped into the line of action and of duty. For these people I appeal to this committee to let Bunker Hill stand; or if there be an occasion for its dishonor, let us take another occasion than the centennial year 1876 to do that deed or discharge that duty. [Earnest and long-continued applause.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, after the eloquent appeal made by the distinguished gentleman from the Charlestown district, [Mr. BANKS,] it may perhaps seem useless for me to attempt to say anything upon the subject which has been presented to the House in the three propositions which are before us. Yet, Mr. Chairman, I propose to say a few words in order that I may lay before the House some facts which it should consider in disposing of the proposition to sell the Charlestown navy-yard.

This yard in the bill of the Committee on Appropriations is proposed to be disposed of. The Committee on Naval Affairs have presented a proposition to keep in active general use the navy-yards at Kittery, Charlestown, Brooklyn, and Norfolk; to use the navy-yards at Pensacola and Mare Island for general purposes of repair; and to recede the navy-yards at New London and League Island. But the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIS,] who addressed the committee to-day, proposes another and a different disposition of the navy-yards. He proposes to sell the Charlestown yard, to close those at Kittery and Pensacola, and to have only two navy-yards in the country: one at Brooklyn, near his own home, and the other on the Pacific coast. Here are three propositions; and all three of these propositions have sprung into existence within the last few days, for I maintain upon this floor that, so far as the Naval Committee have had anything to do with this subject, these propositions have never been heard of within the doors of the committee-room for discussion or deliberation until within the past three days. In all our peregrinations over the land no testimony has been taken by any committee or any member of it in my hearing upon the subject of selling any navy-yard in this country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am a resident of Massachusetts—not, however, particularly interested in the Charlestown navy-yard. I live south of Boston; and I believe that within the last two years there have been but three persons at work in the Charlestown navy-yard from the district which I represent. I have therefore no particular interest in that yard; and notwithstanding the remarks of my colleague who has just taken his seat, I am inclined to the opinion that the interests of Boston do not particularly require that that navy-yard should be preserved. I am not sure that the commercial interests and the wealth of Boston would not be subserved by converting that navy-yard into sites for other kinds of business. It has a grand water-front; it is in the center of that city; it has many advantages for commercial purposes. Therefore, when I speak upon this subject, I am not speaking either from personal interest or from what I deem to be the monetary interests of the community within which that navy-yard is situated. But, sir, I speak of this as a navy-yard which in the past has rendered incalculable service. My eloquent friend has told you of the ships of former times built at that yard and which have reflected honor upon the State and the country; and I may, without giving offense I believe to any man, point to the ships built in that yard within the last fifteen years which made their mark and told in the interests of their country. The navy-yard at Charlestown during the late rebellion was active in all its departments in bringing forth iron-clads and wooden ships of all classes. Thousands of men were successfully employed in that yard during that unhappy period. That this navy-yard during that time—and the object of these remarks is to lay before the House the facilities and advantages which that yard now has, and to present if I can some of the reasons why it should not be sold or destroyed—that this navy-yard during that period was useful to the country no man will deny.

What have we gathered there? What have the people of the United States put in that yard which for naval purposes may hereafter be useful? The only great cordage establishment which the United States Government owns is in the navy-yard at Boston. That establishment for the manufacture of cordage of all kinds and every size is equal to any in the country to-day; and I suppose I might say without vanity that it is superior to almost any in the country. It is ready to start its machinery to-morrow and produce cordage of the first class. My friend from New York [Mr. WILLIS] may point to his navy-yard, over which he rejoices, and may fail to find elsewhere anything like it.

Mr. WILLIS. I wish to correct the gentleman. He refers to the Brooklyn navy-yard as belonging to "the gentleman from New York." That is a great mistake. If the interests of the country could be subserved by the sale of that yard I would cheerfully vote for it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. From the manner of my friend's speech, I ought to be excused for the error.

Furthermore the navy-yard at Charlestown possesses a rolling-mill capable of converting scrap-iron of all kinds into every description of rolled iron used in the Navy, with the exception perhaps of the large armor iron used on iron-clads. It possesses a forging-shop of great dimensions and capacity. This, I think, is not common to all the yards. In the late visit of the committee to that yard we were told by engineers and men familiar with the subject that the yard had the machinery and all the facilities for constructing in every part the largest steam-engines which could be put into any ship of war. In passing through that machine-shop and examining the machinery there, I was of opinion that those who claimed it to be the finest machine-shop in this country were not in error. In the large machine-shops of Charlestown are to be found the most perfect and the largest engines for working iron that can be found in any machine-shop belonging to the Government of the United States. What else is there at that yard? Vast accumulations of timber of all kinds stored in wooden and stone buildings, large docks, wet docks, filled with the timber which the Government has seen fit (in its wisdom, I think) to accumulate and to store up for future needs.

Mr. Chairman, destroy that navy-yard at Charlestown; offer it for sale, as my friend from New York suggests, because it is in a large city, and the land will bring a good price, and then undertake to remove the material which that navy-yard contains. In the first month of your operations you will lose by the destruction of property more than the whole price the navy-yard would bring. We have witnessed such destruction at the Philadelphia navy-yard; we have seen what came of destroying one navy-yard; and, so far as I am concerned, I hope never to witness the destruction which will follow the removal of another.

Mr. Chairman, the navy-yard at Charlestown includes within its limits to-day a vast amount of wealth. The dry-dock of granite, equal to that in the New York yard—commenced in the days of John Quincy Adams and finished in the days of Andrew Jackson—would cost to-day hundreds of thousands of dollars to construct. It is in perfect condition, ready and able to receive the largest ship that floats. The proposition is to sell it; why I do not know. Whence the proposition emanates I scarcely know.

Mr. Chairman, these navy-yards were not made for times of peace. These great accumulations of wealth and material and power were not gathered together for times of peace. They were put there in order that this country might be able in time of war to meet any enemy it might have to contend with upon the sea. League Island to-day is not in condition to receive and copper a ship of fifty tons. There is, to be sure, an immense wooden dry-dock near the navy-yard there; but it is not now in condition for service, and nobody will pretend that it is. There is a ship-house, lately removed from the Philadelphia navy-yard, standing upon piles seven feet above the ground, and which never can be used until there shall be placed under it a stone foundation and the piles removed. The navy-yard at New York, great as that yard is, is to-day a hospital for old hulks unworthy to float upon the sea. It is in no better condition this hour to meet the requirements of war than the navy-yard at Boston.

My friend from New York [Mr. WILLIS] has discussed the question of the Navy, and I will say the remarks the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] made this evening were correct as to the acquaintance of gentlemen with naval affairs. Why, so far as I am concerned, I was placed on that committee I never learned, and the profundity of the ignorance of the gentleman from New York in respect to naval affairs is only excelled by my own. He has given no reasons why the navy-yard at Charlestown should be sold. He has told us why the navy-yard at New York should be preserved, that it is in the center of a great city, while he speaks of other cities in which navy-yards are situated as little country villages. Boston is a little country village and yet the navy-yard there is equal to that of New York. He proposes to sell it and yet the Brooklyn navy-yard is the only one he has ever visited, on his own confession.

While the little village of Boston does not compare with the great city of New York, still I think the gentleman from New York may learn a little about naval affairs if he will spend a few hours in the Charlestown navy-yard; something about the demands of the Government and something about the building of ships of war. He may understand something, too, of what it is to accumulate vast amounts of property and have it ready and in condition for use at any moment.

Now, I care nothing personally on the subject of the Charlestown navy-yard. I have no personal interest in it. I do not believe the people of my State are particularly benefited by it. I do say if there is a community in the country, with the exception of that in and around the city of New York, capable from experience, capable from habit, successfully to perform labor and do work in a navy-yard, that community is within twenty miles of the city of Boston including the city in its limits. Where will you find better skilled mechanics in the construction of machinery than there? Where will you find men better acquainted with the construction of ships than there, or even all the way from the British possessions down to Cape Cod? A large portion of the people residing on the southeastern coast of Massachusetts between Boston and Cape Cod are learned and skilled in the art of ship-building.

Mr. Chairman, there is one subject to which I desire to call the attention of this House, and in that I think I shall agree with the gentleman from New York. He remarked that our navy-yards are silent, that our machinery is still, that we are doing nothing. Yes, granted; and yet we are keeping by our contract system some great private establishment of the country employed in the manufacture of steam-engines, iron plating, and in building and repairing hulls for the Navy of the United States. It is a system pernicious, wasteful, and extravagant. We have had occasion lately to know by our examination that the Charlestown navy-yard has been called upon to furnish to private contractors the timber from its ship-houses and iron and copper from its store-houses, and that a ship of war was being built within sight of the navy-yard under private contract, while the skilled mechanics, the skilled workmen which the United States should keep in its employ were idle or seeking other employment.

Give the navy-yards the legitimate work which belongs to the construction of our Navy, and you have navy-yards enough in the country to do the work. Their capacity is not what it should be. They should be building two ships of war in every navy-yard of the United States to-day, and we should keep on building them. We should keep in full repair all other ships worthy of going to sea. To do that requires more than the New York navy-yard. A little help might be rendered by Boston and Pensacola and a great deal by Norfolk and Mare Island navy-yards.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, this proposition will not meet with any favor in the House, and that the navy-yards, if they are to be sold and disposed of, will be sold and disposed of after some deliberation, after some investigation by competent men. I hope this proposition will not be forced through the House of Representatives upon a bill which came into existence within one week from the time when it is to be finally passed upon by the Representatives of the people.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN LABOR.

Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that the manufacturing interests of the country are fearfuly depressed; that a large percentage of our furnaces and mills and factories and workshops are silent and still, and that a million and more of laborers, many of whom are skilled workmen, are without employment and know not where to get bread for themselves and families, are facts admitted and recognized by gentlemen on both sides of this House. That the people are looking toward and expecting Congress, if possible, to do something to revive the business of the country, restore confidence, and relieve the pressing wants of the people, are also admitted facts. The remedy for all those ills, so far proposed, is a dose of finance, and the amount to be administered ranges from an inflated bolus commensurate with the powers of deglutition, down to an infinitesimal pellet of contraction. After careful and attentive consideration of the many and conflicting prescriptions suggested, each claiming to be an infallible panacea, I am forced to the conclusion that the case is not well understood.

Lord Brougham, when interrogated as to what he understood by the Schleswig-Holstein question answered, that there were but two men who ever comprehended that subject; one man knew and had told him, but that the man who knew had died, and he had forgotten what the man had told him. Now, sir, it does appear to me that the man who understood this finance question practically, and who fully comprehended the situation of the country and who knew how by direct legislation on the finance question to revive the industrial interests of the land, to relieve the pressing wants of the laboring-men, and restore confidence among the people, died some time ago and forgot to tell any man how it was to be done.

It is an easy matter to construct plausible and high-sounding theories of finance, and every man in Congress and out of it has one; but when you come to apply those theories practically, to meet the present condition of affairs, difficulties confront you at every step. The proposition to issue an indefinite amount of greenbacks sufficient, it is asked, to meet the business wants of the country, is a proposition of great latitude and should be accepted with much caution. An essential element in a sound currency is stability of value, and a currency which rests solely upon credit, and which is but a promise to pay without ability to fulfill the promise, must necessarily fluctuate in value, and being unstable itself, must in a greater or less degree unsettle all values and render uncertain and insecure all kinds of business; and the larger the inflation the greater the fluctuation, and the greater the liability to business derangements.

I would be glad to see the time come when what we call a dollar would mean a dollar, and not a promise to pay, and am in favor of a return to a specie basis at the earliest day that is practicable and possible, but am opposed to a forced resumption, which would in my judgment be impossible to maintain, and which would certainly bring distress and ruin upon the industries of the whole country. More than one year has elapsed since the bill was passed fixing the time for resumption, and I would ask gentlemen upon this floor what progress and preparation have we made to meet the requirements of such an exigency? The prospects for resumption on the 1st of January, 1879, are more unfavorable to-day than they were one year ago. The amount of coin in the Treasury of the United States to-day available for that purpose is a mere nominal sum. Many of the advocates of that bill, as well as the Secretary of the Treasury, tacitly admit that their expectations have not been realized and that the act fixing the time for specie resumption was a mistake. Then if we cannot resume by the time fixed, why allow this resumption act to remain suspended over the heads of the manufacturing and business men of the country like the sword over the head of Damocles, threatening and ready to fall at any moment? I am clearly of the opinion that we ought to repeal the clause of that act fixing the time for resumption, and I am well convinced that a large majority of this House are of the same opinion. If by our legislation we have not been able to retain in our country the gold taken from our mines, how can we expect to retain the foreign gold which we purpose to purchase with our bonds? It cannot be done.

With our large indebtedness abroad, requiring so large an amount of gold to pay the interest on our bonds; with the balance of trade against us, averaging over $100,000,000 annually, it is utterly impossible to resume specie payment with this condition of affairs existing, either on the 1st of January, 1879, or at any other time.

To relieve the manufacturing and industrial interests of the country, and to restore confidence and prosperity to the people, I propose three things:

First, repeal the clause fixing the time for resumption, and thus relieve the manufacturers of the impending dread of the results of a forced resumption, and then let the currency question alone, and allow the laws of trade and commerce to regulate the time when specie resumption can be maintained without too severe a shock upon the business of the country.

Second, prohibit banks from paying interest on deposits and enforce and increase the penalties for charging illegal rates. Banks pay 6 per cent. on deposits, and consequently have to discount at rates of 12 and 14 per cent. No manufacturing or other business can be conducted successfully and pay such extortionate rates for money.

Third, instead of reducing our present rates of tariff duties, as proposed by the bill now reported to the House and gotten up in the interests of British manufacturers and free-traders and importers of foreign goods into our country, I would increase the duties upon all products and manufactures which we can produce and manufacture at home. The time has come when we must direct our attention more to the interest and welfare of the many, the laboring class of society, and not so much to the few, the money-changers and importers of foreign fabrics and the stock-jobbers of Wall street. Labor constitutes the wealth of a nation, and, therefore, should receive that careful and earnest consideration of the law-making power of a nation which its importance demands. When you sum up this question of finance, which so troubles, distracts, and befogs the minds of the people, it resolves itself into simply the measures affecting the labor of the country, and the question of labor means the question of protection to American industries.

Is it not a wise policy for every nation to protect her own industries? A nation to become great must become independent, and to become independent must rely mainly, if not solely, upon her own internal resources. Not only her independence, but her civilization, depends upon the development of the resources within her own territory.

It has been said that the amount of coal consumed by a nation, being given, affords a fair measure by which to judge of her civilization, for the reason that coal is the chief aliment of manufacturing industries, and the amount consumed represents the development of the manufacturing interests of the people, upon which the wealth, the prosperity, the greatness, the grandeur, and the independence of a nation depend. No society homogeneous in character, with homogeneity of labor, ever has achieved or ever can achieve national greatness or national distinction. Extent and variety of manufactures develop trade and commerce and create a steady and reliable home market for the products of the soil, so that all departments of industry are benefited and the people contented and prosperous; and with prosperity and accumulation of wealth, the fine arts, literature, and science find encouragement; so that just in proportion to the differentiation of labor does society more and more perfect its organization and the people rise higher and higher in the scale of civilization. Great Britain, under the fostering care and high protective policy of her government, built up and extended and diversified her manufacturing interests till her labor-saving machinery became so varied, so immense, and complete that she aspired to the proud preeminence of making her workshops the workshops of the world, her consumption of coal being so far in excess of any other nation on the globe that to-day she claims to stand first in rank among the civilized nations of the world.

If, then, the consumption of coal by a nation be a measure of its actual civilization, then the coal area of a nation ought to be a measure of its potential civilization. The United States, having a larger coal area than the world besides, under wise and comprehensive legislation ought to march to the front and take the first place in the rank of civilized nations. In extent and variety of minerals, in magnitude of national domain, in fertility of soil and its adaptation to the growth of almost every variety of products, in saluority of climate, and in external and internal facilities for commerce we stand without a peer among the nations of the earth.

In my judgment this question of protection to American labor is the great question before the American people to-day. It rests on the unquestioned principle inherent in nations as well as in individuals, the right of self-preservation. It is upon this principle that Congress, the law-making power of the United States, has the right to make and enforce tariff laws. I never understood by what principle of right and justice one nation could impose and collect duties upon the importation of products and manufactures of another nation for the purpose of raising revenue to meet the expenses of the state; but when imposed to protect its own industries the principle becomes plain and intelligible and the question of revenue becomes incidental. In this country, where we have a large public domain and which is accessible to every one, men will not toil from morning to night for a mere subsistence, and should not, for that can be obtained by the culture of a few acres of land with much less labor. Besides, it should not be the policy of this great and free Government to impoverish the laboring class of society. The mechanic and laborer should receive fair and remunerative wages, so that they may be able to surround themselves with many of the comforts of life and to educate their children, so as to fit them for the better discharge of the high and responsible duties incumbent upon them as citizens of the United States.

I do not accept the constabulary idea of government, that it is but a police arrangement for the punishment of offenders of the law and the enforcement of contracts. These are but the lower functions of government. The end of government is the good of the people, and that government is best administered when the greatest good is done to the greatest number. Ours is pre-eminently a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. Wise legislation should and will look to the welfare of the whole, and not to the particular interests of a few, and whenever legislation departs from this sound principle of public policy the state becomes weakened. Each and every citizen should feel that his interests and happiness are as well cared for as can possibly be done, having a proper regard for the general welfare of the whole. Feeling that he has this care and consideration bestowed upon him, he manifests a just pride in his government and becomes strongly attached to its interests and perpetuity, and the state thereby becomes strong in all its parts. Whenever a government fails to throw her protecting care over any class of her citizens and allows them to suffer hardships that might be relieved, she thereby alienates that class from herself and becomes weaker just in proportion to the numbers and to the extent of the alienation.

With cheap money and cheap labor of the Old World the European manufacturer can bring his wares and fabrics to our very doors and undersell us at home, putting out the fires of our own workshops, impoverishing our own laborers and mechanics, and diminishing the wealth of the nation. We have to-day in our country one million and a half of men out of employment, and a large proportion of them skilled laborers, who ought and could each earn at least one dollar per day, so that one million and a half of dollars are daily lost to the country. To remedy this seems to me to be the great financial problem to be solved.

The only way to accomplish this object is to direct our legislation to the promotion of the general welfare of the country by the development and the protection of our own industries, or, in other words, we must make and sell more and buy less. The people understand this question better than we do, and are determined to be heard on this matter, and woe be to that party which places itself in antagonism to this great and momentous question of American policy. I am glad to find that the press all over the land are discussing this question with much interest. The Chicago Inter-Ocean, one of the ablest conducted papers in the country, speaking on this subject a few days ago, says:

> The people of every section and every party must soon be convinced that relief to the finances of this country can come only through the development of every form of productive resources. Precisely to the extent that the national policy has departed from that rule and substituted discouragements and antagonisms for that generous recognition and ample protection which every nation owes to the industries and business of its people, has the course of things gone wrong. In 1872 Congress found the country so prosperous that it gave away the revenues with a free and almost destructive hand. It abolished import duties yielding thirty millions of revenue, and it gave relief, or intended to give relief, to many rates of duty supposed to be oppressive to the people here who consumed imported goods. The purpose was good, but the act was bad; the relief came chiefly to the producers in foreign countries who had no other market equal to our own. The following statement shows that the imports free of duty have risen from about fifty to one hundred and eighty millions within six years, and that the aggregate paying duty fell off nearly two hundred millions in 1875 from its amount in 1872. We have opened the flood-gates of free importation, as we shall see, at quite too heavy a cost:

Imports in the fiscal years of 1869 to 1875.

Years.	Free.	Paying duty.
1869–'70	$46,559,965	$415,817,672
1870–'71	57,857,761	483,635,947
1871–'72	61,010,902	579,327,864
1872–'73	166,236,824	497,320,326
1873–'74	179,936,668	415,924,589
1874–'75	167,180,614	386,725,509

It will be seen that we have given up our markets to foreigners with a freedom that could scarcely fail to drain us of gold. All these imports are paid for in gold; and, when their aggregate rises to $663,617,147 in one year, as in 1872–'73, it is reasonable to expect prostration to follow. Since the fatal reductions of the several acts of 1872, we have imported an average of more than six hundred millions yearly, and have let one-third of this vast aggregate come in free of duty. It did not need a prophet to predict paralysis and bankruptcy as certain to follow on such events.

This presents a correct view of the chief cause which has so nearly overwhelmed the country in financial distress and industrial ruin. During the last ten years our imports have exceeded our exports $1,100,000,000. Is it strange, then, that we have to-day one million and a half of men pleading and begging for work and the country becoming impoverished? Not at all.

I have compiled a table showing the values of a few leading articles of importation into the United States for the last three fiscal years ending June 30, 1875:

Here we have the figures, showing that in three years, during panic times, that of a few leading articles, which we should have produced and manufactured at home, we have imported to the amount of $726,281,670, while our own mills and factories and workshops have been standing comparatively idle. Is this the kind of policy that gentlemen on this floor wish to adopt? Will such a policy result in national greatness and national independence?

One fact, sir, is worth a dozen of theories; and the great fact that to-day stands out before the world, illustrating the soundness of the protective policy, is the financial and industrial condition of France. But a few years ago, when the victorious German army marched up to the gates and into the city of Paris, and compelled that proud nation to capitulate, Bismarck imposed an indemnity upon the nation of $1,000,000,000 in gold. Bismarck intended to impoverish the French people to the extent that they could not give Germany any more trouble for a generation to come. What has been the result? France increased her duties on importations, and on many articles the duties amounted to an entire prohibition, and at once put her wheels and hammers and spindles in operation all over the land, and the result has been that France has paid the indemnity imposed, and to-day has more gold and silver in her coffers than any nation in the world; and her exports, during the last fiscal year, have amounted to over $800,000,000. Her exports have exceeded her imports over $100,000,000 annually, while ours have been directly the reverse. She has become rich, while we have become poor. Other illustrations of the reverse of this policy can be found in the present condition of India, Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, Peru, and some other nations, which have adopted the opposite, or free-trade policy. These nations have become impoverished, weak, and dependent, and to-day their commerce is not worth looking after.

It has been said that our tariff is higher than that of any nation of Europe. This is not a fact; and I am indebted to my friend Dr. Young, of the Bureau of Statistics, for the following table, giving the rates of tariff on iron and steel in France, Austria, Russia, and Italy. I have not chosen these two articles because the duties on them were higher than on other articles, but because they represented two leading articles of commerce, and gave the general rates of tariff in those countries:

To illustrate more clearly the fact which I wish to present, I have in conjunction with the above table another, giving the rates of wages paid to skilled workmen in those same countries:

Now, sir, I maintain that, when you take into consideration the cheapness of money in those countries, with the rates of wages paid for skilled labor, and the cost of subsistence, their tariff rates are from 10 to 25 per cent. higher than the tariff rates in this country as against the manufacturer.

Our American manufacturers cannot pay such high rates of interest on money as they have been doing, and pay the wages that our American mechanics should receive, unless they are adequately protected against the cheap money and cheap labor of the Old World. I am told by all the manufacturers with whom I have conversed, that if this iniquitous and crude bill now before the House should become a law, they will be compelled to close their doors. Should this bill become a law, I say to gentlemen now and here, that the distress complained of so much to-day is nothing compared to that which is to follow.

There is another mistaken idea which I find current in many places, and it is this: it is claimed that our country is so large, with such diversity of soil, and climate, and resources, that naturally there must be a diversity of interests, and that it is difficult, if not impossible, to frame tariff laws that will bear equally upon all parts of the country. No graver error was ever conceived; it is this very diversity of soil, and climate, and resources, and labor, which creates and produces unity of interests. It is the differenciation of labor that begets reciprocity of interests, and makes a nation united, great, and independent.

I say to gentlemen of the South, you have the finest country in the world: compared with the hills of New England yours is a paradise; but the indomitable pluck of the New England men has made their barren hills to blossom as the rose and her workshops and mills to be seen on every hill and in every valley. Your mineral resources are inexhaustible. Sustain, then, the policy of protection to your own industries, and invite capitalists from abroad to come among you and build furnaces and rolling-mills and assist you to develop your own wonderful resources. Erect cotton factories where cotton is grown; plant more cotton in your rich alluvial lands, so well adapted to its growth, where you now raise corn, and purchase your wheat and corn from the people of Illinois, who cannot raise cotton, and send them in return your cotton fabrics.

The State of Missouri, with her geographical position and her extraordinary mineral resources, with fine soil and climate, under a stable and protective policy, would soon take rank among the first States of this Union.

To gentlemen from the Western and Northwestern States, which are more purely devoted to agricultural pursuits, I say, that the best and most reliable market for the products of your farms is the home market. In an able paper published by David H. Mason, esq., of Chicago, and addressed to the western farmers, in speaking of the wonderful growth of the import and export trade of this country since 1861, he says:

> The explanation of this extraordinary growth of both export and import trade is to be found in the activity, enterprise, and prosperity of the home market, through the beneficial operation of the protective policy upon domestic industry. That policy encouraged manufactures on our own soil; diversified employments; created a demand for labor; advanced the rate of wages, and conferred purchasing power upon the masses of the people. It is the expenditure of earnings that energizes commerce and trade. A population that is steadily employed and well paid can buy and consume; but not otherwise. The sum of social misery among a people can be measured by their inability to obtain wages. Regular employment and labor fully compensated are the fruitful parents of general prosperity, content, and cheerfulness. Where there is work for the hands of men, there is work for their teeth, clothes for their body, shelter for their heads, fuel for their warmth, instruction for their minds, and progress for their condition. The protective policy, by conferring purchasing power, caused an increasing demand for all these things; and, by stimulating the productive forces, satisfied that demand. Services easily found employment, and the circulation of commodities from hand to hand became rapid. The home market, formerly sluggish, was converted into a scene of enterprise and thrift; abundance became the order of the day; and both exports and imports expanded to unprecedented values. A prosperous foreign trade is inseparably connected with a prosperous home market. There must be a large development of internal commerce before there can be a large development of external commerce. No more than an individual can a nation exert great strength outwardly unless such strength exists inwardly. To neglect the home market, by reaching out after the foreign, is to neglect the substance to pursue a phantom.

The home market to the people of the United States is worth more than all the markets of the world besides.

There is an objection brought against the protective policy, and particularly by the western people, which has no foundation in fact. It is alleged that the consumer pays the duty, and consequently it requires more of the farm products for less of the manufactured articles. Facts and experience prove that the objection is not valid. The foreign producer pays the larger share of the duty, and home competition soon brings down the price to the lowest point at which the article can be manufactured. American manufacturers are satisfied with much less profit than the foreign manufacturer, when he has the sole control of the market. Statistics prove that the western farmers exported more wheat and corn and received higher prices during the years of protective policy than they did under partial free trade. During the thirteen years from 1849 to 1861, under partial free trade, 88,629,783 bushels of wheat and 36,745,003 barrels of wheat flour were exported, or averaging annually 6,817,676 bushels of wheat, average price $1.30 per bushel, and 2,826,539 barrels of flour, averaging $6.07 per barrel; while from 1861 till 1874, thirteen years of protective policy, we exported 359,849,413 bushels of wheat, and 39,713,318 barrels of wheat flour, or annually 27,680,724 bushels of wheat, average price $1.37, and 3,054,871 barrels of flour, average price $7.33 per barrel. In the same partial free-trade period, from 1849 till 1861, we exported 82,033,737 bushels corn, or annually 6,310,287 bushels, average price 68.5 cents per bushel, and 3,280,722 barrels of corn-meal, or annually 252,363 barrels, average price $3.56 per barrel; while in the same period of protective policy, from 1861 till 1874, we exported 207,221,555 bushels of corn, or annually 15,940,120 bushels, average price 74.8 cents per bushel, and 3,640,717 barrels corn-meal, or annually 280,055 barrels, at an average price of $4.71 per barrel.

The same fact holds good in regard to the price of wool. Prices have always ranged higher when we have had high rates of protection and lower when low rates of tariff. Let me say to gentlemen from the West that your large prairie farms by the continuous production of wheat and corn will soon become exhausted, and you will find it a wiser and better policy to grow less wheat and more wool, which will pay you quite as well and at the same time render your lands more fertile. We ought to produce our own wool and manufacture our own woolen goods, and not go abroad for a single pound. Yet during the years of 1873, 1874, and 1875 we have imported $39,755,503 worth of unmanufactured wool and $140,766,797 of woolen goods.

The western people should erect woolen factories all over their country and manufacture their own woolen goods, which would at the same time create a home market for the various products of the farm. The increase in our country of the growth of wool and manufacture of woolen goods is one of the most encouraging signs of the times.

I am indebted again to Mr. Mason for the following statement and table touching the woolen interest:

To show the sudden and vast growth of the wool industry and the woolen manufacture in the United States under protection, we have compiled from the census reports the following tabular statement for three several periods:

Particulars.	1870.	1860.	1850.
Number of woolen mills	2,891	1,260	1,559
Sets of cards	8,366	3,209	.....
Hands employed	80,053	42,728	27,682
Capital invested	$98,824,531	$30,862,654	$28,118,650
Wages paid	$26,877,575	$9,610,254	.....
Wool consumed ..... lbs.	172,078,919	83,608,468	70,862,829
Value of products	$155,405,358	$61,894,986	$43,207,545
Number of sheep	28,477,951	22,471,275	.....
Domestic wool crop ..... lbs.	100,102,387	60,264,913	.....
Population	38,558,371	31,443,321	23,191,876

These significant figures tell the story of benefits conferred upon farmers by the protective policy. What else but the demand created by it for domestic wool could have induced such a heavy increase in the number of sheep? What else could have kept the price of wool up to such high figures in the face of such a large addition to the supply? See how slowly the woolen manufacture crept forward between 1850 and 1860, the number of establishments absolutely diminishing—that is, the big fishes eating up the little ones—under the free-trade tariffs of 1846 and 1857. Then observe the advance by mighty strides between 1860 and 1870 under tariff protection, the progress having been very much faster than that of population. Of the wool consumed by the mills in 1870, as much as 154,767,095 pounds had been derived from various seasons of the domestic crop.

Farmers should study these statistics, which bristle all over with facts closely allied with their interests. To cap all, staple woolen goods are cheaper than they were before the war, as the prices-current will prove. Yet free-traders, with monstrous absurdity and dogmatic assurance, insist that western farmers are plundered by our system of tariff. They never were more prosperous, and they know it. They, of all classes, were least affected by the panic of 1873, because of protection to home industry.

Whenever any branch of American industry has been stimulated into activity by the protective policy, it has invariably reduced the price below that which was paid for the imported article. This proposition can be substantiated by an accumulation of facts which are incontrovertible.

A few years ago we paid twenty-five cents per yard for British cotton prints. American competition and increased facilities for manufacturing soon brought down the price to fifteen cents per yard, and, finally, just before the late war, good prints could be bought for twelve cents per yard, and that was as low as it was supposed the price could be brought. But improved machinery and the increased number of cotton mills, stimulated by protection, have reduced the price still lower, until to-day the same quality of prints can be bought for eight cents per yard.

In an interview with James E. Emerson, esq., a highly intelligent gentleman of the firm of Emerson & Ford, manufacturers of steel saws at Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania, I was informed that for twenty years, while manufacturing steel-saws in the State of Connecticut, he had purchased all their saw-steel from Mr. Jessup, of Sheffield, England, but for the last four years, since our American steel manufacturers have come in competition with English manufacturers, he had not purchased one pound of English saw-steel, and that the American saw-steel was of a better quality, and for which he paid 20 per cent. less.

In 1870, when a bill was before Congress to increase the tariff on the importation of English Bessemer steel rails, it met with stout opposition from gentlemen of the West, and it was stated on this floor that whatever increased duty was placed on steel rails would enhance the price of the rails just that much to the purchaser; that the price in New York at that time for steel rails was $120 per ton; and that it required over one hundred bushels of western wheat to buy one ton of steel rails; and whatever additional tariff was imposed would require just that amount more of wheat to purchase a ton of rails, and those gentlemen believed it, notwithstanding it was shown that it was a mistake. What has been the result? The bill was passed, large rail-mills have been erected in our country, and to-day Bessemer steel rails can be had for $65 per ton, requiring little more than half as much western wheat to buy a ton of rails.

Facts, sir, could be multiplied indefinitely proving the truth of the proposition; but I am admonished that my time has expired, and I must bring my remarks to a close.

It might be wise, sir, for this House to call a halt in our headlong course and take a quiet survey of the situation. We have been in session for nearly six months and have absolutely accomplished nothing of importance to the country. The principal business of this session has been the running of investigating committees, and so far at a cost to the country of not less than $800,000, and the business has been conducted in such a reckless and discreditable manner as to produce much demoralization to the whole country, and until our committees in many instances have degenerated into mere smut-machines, and until honest and decent men everywhere, irrespective of party, have become utterly disgusted with our proceedings.

The majority of this House have passed a diplomatic bill cutting up by the roots our foreign service and bunched together three or four of the states of South America whose commercial relations are naturally with us, and have provided for a resident minister to each bunch. We may call this economy, but it is not statesmanship. We have also just made a horizontal cut through the salaries of the clerks of the several Departments of the Government whose pay affords but a bare subsistence, and what is worse, the bill has overturned the organized system of conducting the business of the Government which had taken years of careful experience to perfect. We may call this retrenchment, but it is not reform. The majority of this House may overthrow our present tariff laws, but I tell you now and here that it will prove disastrous to the country, and the party which does it will meet with certain and utter defeat.

Mr. WILLIS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. RANDALL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CUTLER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORTON. Before the doors are closed, I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will be received.

Mr. MORTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of December to inquire whether, in the election of GEORGE E. SPENCER as a Senator in Congress from the State of Alabama, there were used and employed corrupt means or corrupt practices to secure his election to the seat he now holds, to submit a report thereon.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I desire to say that while I concur in the conclusion of the committee so far as the evidence taken before the committee is concerned, and believe that there is nothing to inculpate Mr. SPENCER in connection with bribery in the procurement of his election, I do differ, however, with the majority of the committee in reference to the extent to which the testimony went. In my judgment there was an exclusion of testimony bearing upon the subject which ought to have been taken and submitted to the consideration of the Senate. I also differ in the conclusion of the committee in regard to the allegations filed on the part of counsel representing the State of Alabama, alleging the invalidity of the election of Mr. SPENCER to the Senate, the committee thinking that it was so far res adjudicata that it ought not to be brought to the attention of the Senate. I think that the testimony should have been offered in that case. I therefore differ with the committee in the rejection of evidence bearing upon that point.

I propose, with the consent of the Senate, briefly to state in writing the points of difference between myself and the committee at some future time. I ask that I may be allowed a few days in order to prepare a brief statement of the points in which I differ with the majority of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and leave is granted. The report will lie on the table and be printed, if there is no objection.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

Several Senators rose with morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will prolong the legislative session, by common consent, until some Senator objects.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to postpone the court of impeachment until half past twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES presented the petition of William Phillips and others, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, owners of the bark Richmond, praying compensation for losses incurred by reason of the acts of the Shenandoah; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES ON THE LATE MR. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to print five thousand copies of the addresses made in the two Houses of Congress on the death of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, late a member of the House from Connecticut, to report it back favorably. I will state that the Joint Committee on Printing have agreed that they will not report favorably any resolutions of this kind to print extra copies of obituary addresses unless by the express order of the two Houses; but as the death of Mr. Starkweather occurred before this action was taken by the joint committee, the Committee on Printing of the Senate thought it would be better to print these addresses, as this is the only case pending when that order was made. I ask the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 2,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, a member of the House of Representatives, and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Starkweather to accompany the same.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

No. 855) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Benjamin Fenton and D. W. Fenton.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Captain John Lee Davis, for himself and on behalf of the officers and men composing the crew of the United States steamer Colorado, praying to be allowed to share in the prize-money arising from the capture of New Orleans in 1862, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. MITCHELL. If there is no further morning business, I will state that there is on the Calendar a bill which if it is not exactly a privileged question comes very near to it. I refer to the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, which was vetoed by the President six weeks or perhaps two months ago and returned to the Senate. The bill was then referred with the message of the President to the Committee on Claims, and on the 19th of April it was reported back, with the recommendation that it pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the message and bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, the sum of $164, in full for moneys wrongfully collected from said Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1869, and January, 1870.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act did originate in the Senate.

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the report of the committee read, and also the veto message of the President.

Mr. MITCHELL. The message appears in the report. We will get the whole thing by hearing the report.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Claims April 19, 1876:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States returning, with his objections, the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, having duly considered the same, beg respectfully to report the said bill back to the Senate, with the recommendation that it pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

The veto power is one lodged in the Executive by the Constitution as a means of protection to the people against the evil consequences of vicious legislation, resulting, as it sometimes does, from hasty or inconsiderate legislative action; and although the power exists in Congress to breathe the breath of statutory life into a bill once passed notwithstanding the President's objections, it is a power that should never be exercised except after the most careful consideration of the reasons given by the Executive for withholding his approval. As a power approaching, as does the veto power under our Constitution, so nearly to that exercised without restraint by the heads of despotic governments should never be exercised except on the fullest consideration of the case, and where the objections are clearly apparent, so with equal care and deliberation should Congress undertake to say that a bill which the President, for reasons given, says ought not to become a law shall become such.

Impressed with these considerations, your committee have given this case a most thorough investigation, and have come to the unanimous opinion that the veto message of the President is based upon an entire misapprehension of the facts.

The bill is a private one for the relief of two citizens of the State of Kentucky, G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham. The amount involved is $164.

The bill, as it passed both Houses of Congress, is in the following words:

An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, the sum of $164, in full for moneys wrongfully collected from said Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1869, and January, 1870.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The report of the Senate committee, upon which favorable action was had, reads as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of W. T. Cheatham, praying to be re-imbursed for certain moneys wrongfully paid to the Government as a distiller of whisky, in Kentucky, have had the same under consideration, and beg to submit the following report:

"William T. Cheatham was engaged in the manufacture of whisky in Daviess County, Kentucky, in the year 1869; that petitioners were his boudsmen to the Government as such distiller; that on the 14th day of December, A. D. 1869, said Cheatham permanently discontinued his said distillery, and all taxes and charges then due on all liquors in bond were then tendered to the collector of internal revenue by Cheatham, having sold all said liquor to third parties; and on that day notice of such permanent discontinuance was filed in the office of the United States assessor of the second district of Kentucky, in which district said distillery was located; that the collector of said district wrongfully refused to issue permits to the purchasers of said whisky for the removal of the same from the bonded warehouse for a period of fifteen days, in December, 1869, and twenty-six days in 1870, in all forty-one days, during which period of forty-one days said Cheatham was wrongfully assessed the salary of a store-keeper of said bonded warehouse, to wit, $4 per day, amounting in all to the sum of $164, which amount said Cheatham afterward, in December, 1870, paid to the collector of internal revenue for said district; that, in consideration of moneys advanced by petitioners to said Cheatham and for his benefit, he, Cheatham, transferred to petitioners all his right to such moneys so wrongfully collected and the right to collect the same.

"Wherefore your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage."

The veto message of the President is very brief and in these words:

To the Senate of the United States:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, I have the honor to return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 489, entitled "An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 31, 1876.

It will be observed that the only reasons given by the President for the exercise of the veto power in this case are, to use his language, those "set forth in an accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury."

This accompanying communication of the Secretary of the Treasury is in the following words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 30, 1876.

To the PRESIDENT:

Referring to the letter of the 25th instant, written by your direction, transmitting Senate bill No. 489, "for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham," and requesting my opinion as to the propriety of its approval by you, I have to say that there are no data on file in the Department, so far as I can learn, which indicate that the amount it is proposed by this bill to refund to the assignees of Mr. Cheatham was wrongfully collected or that the amount should be refunded.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his report to me in reference to the matter, says:

"The re-imbursement to the United States by said Cheatham of salary paid to this store-keeper by the collector of internal revenue for the months of December, 1869, and January, 1870, was in accordance with the provisions of joint resolution of March 29, 1869, (volume 16, Statutes at Large, page 52,) and there appears to be no reason for the refunding by the United States to the assignees of said Cheatham the salary of this store-keeper that would not apply with equal force to similar payments by all other distillers who were operating their distilleries or had spirits in their warehouse at that time.

"The facts above stated are considered by this Office valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill, and they would have been communicated to the congressional committees before the passage of the bill, had they called the attention of this Office to the subject."

The bill is herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Relying, as the President did, on this letter of his Secretary, to whom the bill had been referred for his "opinion as to the propriety of its approval" by the President, it is not surprising that the Executive sanction was withheld.

But the question arises, how far was the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury justified by the facts in the case and are the statements contained in the report of Commissioner Pratt, which constitutes a part of the Secretary's communication, in accordance with the record of his own Bureau?

The Commissioner asserts in his report that "there appears to be no reason for the refunding by the United States to the assignees of said Cheatham the salary of this store-keeper that would not apply with equal force to similar payments by all other distillers who were operating their distilleries or had spirits in their warehouses at that time."

And the Secretary of the Treasury, referring to this report of Commissioner Pratt, advises the President that "the facts above stated are considered by this Office valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill," and concludes his communication to the President with the declaration "that they," the above facts, "would have been communicated to the congressional committees before the passage of the bill, had they called the attention of this Office to the subject."

That the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury had been called to this subject in the most solemn and formal manner possible, and the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equities of the case asked and such opinion given, and that, too, favorable to the equities of the parties claiming relief, will be seen from the following records of the Senate and letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

This subject was before the Forty-third Congress. On the 5th day of January, 1874, Senator McCREERY, of Kentucky, submitted to the Senate the following resolution, which was on that day unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the Senate the papers on file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, with an opinion from said Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of a drawback of $164, alleged to have been improperly and unlawfully collected by the revenue officers of said district."

On the 15th of January, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to the above resolution, addressed to the then President pro tempore the following communication, accompanied with a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is also here given:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1874.

SIR: As requested in the Senate resolution of the 5th instant, I herewith transmit the papers in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, together with an opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of refunding to the said Cheatham the sum of $164.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. M. H. CARPENTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The letter of the Commissioner is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1874.

SIR: In response to the inclosed resolution of the Senate, I herewith transmit to you the original application on form 46 of E. H. Luckett and G. B. Tyler, assignees and sureties on the distiller's bond of William T. Cheatham, of the second district of Kentucky, together with all the papers accompanying said application, asking to have refunded the sum of $164. It appears from the correspondence of this Office with Collector J. R. Rend that William T. Cheatham was in arrears for taxes due from him as distiller; but if it shall, however, be shown that all the whisky in bond had been sold to bona fide purchasers and that the taxes due thereon had been tendered to the collector prior to the 14th day of December, 1869, (the day of permanent discontinuance of said William T. Cheatham's distillery,) and before seizure and distraint, then I am of opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS, Commissioner.

Hon. W. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

It will be perceived from this letter that the Commissioner submits a question of fact, and then declares in the most positive terms that if this question is found a certain way, then it is his "opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery."

That is to say, the Commissioner declares that "it appears from the correspondence of this Office with Collector J. R. Rend that William T. Cheatham was in arrears for taxes due him as distiller." But says the Commissioner further:

"But if it shall, however, be shown that all the whisky in bond had been sold to bona fide purchasers and that the taxes due thereon had been tendered to the collector prior to the 14th day of December, 1869, (the day of permanent discontinuance of said William T. Cheatham's distillery,) and before seizure and distraint, then I am of opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery."

In reference to this question, your committee did find as a matter of fact in their former report upon this bill, and they now find—and the evidence is convincing and undisputed—that William T. Cheatham had, prior to December 14, 1869, (the date of permanent discontinuance of his distillery; and that is a matter of record,) and before any seizure or distraint, sold all the whisky in bond to bona fide purchasers, and that he had also on said day, December 14, 1869, tendered to the collector of internal revenue all taxes and charges due thereon. Your committee then found, and now find, the existence of a state of facts in reference to this case upon which, if found, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue declared an equity would be created in favor of the relief awarded by the bill under consideration.

To recapitulate: By the provisions of joint resolution of Congress of March 29, 1869, (volume 16, Statutes at Large, page 52,) entitled "A joint resolution to supply omissions in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts," approved March 3, 1869, it was provided as follows:

"That after the passage of this act the proprietors of all internal-revenue bonded warehouses shall re-imburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all store-keepers or other officers in charge of such warehouses, and the same shall be paid into the Treasury and accounted for like other public moneys."

William T. Cheatham was engaged in the business of manufacturing whisky in Daviess County, Kentucky. On the 14th day of December, 1869, he permanently discontinued his distillery, and all taxes and charges then due on all liquors in bond were by him then tendered to the collector of internal revenue, he, Cheatham, having, prior to that date sold all said liquor to third parties, bona fide purchasers; that the collector of said district wrongfully refused to issue permits to the purchasers of said whisky for the removal of the same from the bonded warehouse for a period of fifteen days in December, 1869, and twenty-six days in 1870, in all forty-one days, during which time of forty-one days Cheatham was wrongfully assessed the salary of a store-keeper of said bonded warehouse, to wit, $4 per day, amounting in all to the sum of $164, which amount said Cheatham paid to the collector, and the same has been paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The petitioners, Tyler and Luckett, were Cheatham's bondsmen to the Government as such distiller, that in consideration of moneys advanced by Tyler and Luckett to said Cheatham, and for his benefit, he, Cheatham, transferred to them all his right to such moneys so wrongfully collected, and the right to collect the same.

This amount, then, of $164 was wrongfully collected from William T. Cheatham, and the United States Treasury has received the money.

It is not the case where a party has suffered by the wrongful act of a public officer, and where the Government has reaped no benefit; it is just the reverse. By the wrongful act of the collector Mr. Cheatham was compelled to pay wrongfully $164, which money, so wrongfully collected, went into the public Treasury, and it (the Treasury) has become, so to speak, the receptacle of money of a private citizen to just that amount, and by every rule of equity and good morals it should disgorge. This is the true statement of this case, free from all exaggeration or embellishment. And so far from there being, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, "valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill," there is not an objection that can be successfully urged against it, while equity and good conscience and public morals unite in its support. Again, it is not the fact that the Treasury Department was not consulted, but, as has been shown, its opinion was solicited and received in the most formal manner known to the proceedings of the Senate in such cases.

Your committee therefore beg, respectfully, to submit—

First. That the bill is one that commends itself to the favorable consideration of the Senate, and should become a law.

Second. That it was not hastily or inconsiderately passed, or without asking for and receiving information from the Treasury Department on the subject.

Thirdly. That the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the veto of the President rests, was evidently written, as was also the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a hasty and inconsiderate manner, and in a way calculated to mislead, and which evidently did mislead, the President.

Had these officials but consulted the records of their respective offices, the letter of the Hon. Secretary of the Treasury would not, as it does, have contained an implied censure of the Committees on Claims of Senate and House for not, as he states, calling attention of his office to the subject.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the facts of the case as here presented, respectfully report back Senate bill No. 489, with the unanimous recommendation that it pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, "Shall the bill pass notwithstanding the objections of the President?" which question must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 46, nays 0; as follows:

NAYS—0.

ABSENT—Messrs. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Two-thirds of the Senate having voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed.

COUNSEL FOR CASES BEFORE CONGRESS.

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to offer the following resolution:

Ordered, That all persons or corporations employing counsel or agents to represent their interests in regard to any measure pending at any time before this House, or any committee thereof, shall cause the name and authority of such counsel or agent to be filed with the Clerk of the House; and no person whose name and authority are not so filed shall appear as counsel or agent before any committee of this House.

I desire the leave of the House to say a word in regard to this resolution. The committee were led to propose its passage from this fact, that on an important bill which is now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary it was argued at the request of an important corporation. Since that time four persons coming from different parts of the country, coming from the cities or neighborhood which the different members of the committee come from, have accosted members of the committee in regard to that particular measure. How many counsels there are or may be employed, we do not know. Now, it seems to us that it would be a great protection to members of the committee and of the House to require any person or corporation who employ an agent to represent his or its interest here to file the name of that agent with the House, so that the House may know who is the responsible agent in such cases.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, and it is, what sort of authentication it would give if a letter were filed with the Clerk?

Mr. HOAR. I think the order of the House requires that the corporation or person shall file with the Clerk the authority given to counsel, and that of course would be a written authority.

Mr. DURHAM. I agree with the gentleman entirely, only I think he might make it more specific.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that necessary.

Mr. BANKS. I think the rules require that authority of such counsel or agents shall be filed with the Clerk.

Mr. HOAR. This order requires that the authority to act as counsel shall be filed with the Clerk, and I think that, if my colleague or the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM,] being ex-Congressmen, were to present themselves as counsel, it would be a very proper inquiry if they were authorized to act as the counsel for the particular interest in which they appeared.

Mr. DURHAM. I agree with the gentleman except in this, that the authenticity of a single letter might sometimes be called in question.

Mr. HOAR. I think the resolution is specific enough.

The resolution was adopted.

POST-ROUTE IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads a bill, (H. R. No. 3495,) as a substitute for House bill No. 333, a bill for the relief of the mail contractor on route No. 19319 in Tennessee.

The bill authorizes the Postmaster-General to put mail service on the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad from Tullahoma to McMinnville, in the State of Tennessee, in the same manner as now provided by law for railroad mail transportation, and that the earnings for said service shall not be withheld on account of any claim due, or alleged to be due, from the old corporation of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad to the United States.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is that bill reported from any committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to its consideration at the present time?

Mr. HOLMAN. In the absence of any explanation——

Mr. WADDELL. I propose to make an explanation, if I can be permitted to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve my right to object until the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] shall explain the purpose and necessity of the bill. It is impossible to tell the effect of this measure from hearing it read.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not propose to have the House act without full explanation of the reasons which prompted the committee to report this bill. The facts are simply these: In 1852, under a general act of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad was constructed, running from McMinnville to a place called Tullahoma, a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles. The State of Tennessee issued her bonds to aid in the construction of that railroad to the amount of $350,000. Directly after the war, in 1866, the State of Tennessee issued additional bonds to the extent of $300,000, making a debt of $650,000, for which she had become responsible on behalf of this road, and to secure which she took a first mortgage on the road.

In the same year, 1866, the Quartermaster-General sold to this railroad some rolling-stock and material, and one of the conditions upon which the sale was made was that all dues from the Government to the road, whether for carrying the mails or otherwise, should be withheld until that rolling-stock had been paid for, which was all right.

In 1870 the State of Tennessee ordered that all railroads delinquent to the State should be sold under the mortgages held by the State, and this railroad with others was sold. This railroad was purchased by the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company for $300,000, not one-half the amount due the State. The Memphis and Charleston Railroad continued to carry the mails on this route, but when they presented their bills for payment the Postmaster-General, under instructions as it seems from the Quartermaster-General, refused to pay the new corporation because the contract by the old corporation to pay for this rolling-stock had not been complied with; whereupon the new corporation stopped carrying the mails.

The Post-Office Department were thus compelled to make a contract with a man who has been carrying the mail in a hack from 1873 to this time. That hack line runs directly by the side of this railroad. The man who runs the hack line has leased the railroad, but he continues to run the hack line alongside of the railroad, at a cost to the Government of $2,000 a year, whereas the regular mail pay on the railroad route would be only about $1,700 a year. In the mean time, ten counties of the State of Tennessee are denied the mail facilities which they formerly had. That is to say, the people of these ten counties are punished by being deprived of their mail facilities because an insolvent corporation, which has been sold out under mortgage of the State and the road conveyed into new hands, cannot carry out its contract with the War Department. The Quartermaster-General uses this language:

> The rights of the United States are not affected by the sale of the railroad by the State of Tennessee.

That is to say, because the Government of the United States sold in 1866 some rolling-stock to this railroad corporation, on condition that the mail pay should be retained until that rolling-stock was paid for, the State of Tennessee cannot sell the road under a mortgage; and, besides, the mail shall not be carried upon this road and paid for until the old debt to this Government shall be liquidated. In the mean time the people of these ten counties are denied their proper mail facilities, and sometimes are absolutely deprived of any mail facilities, in consequence of the streams along the route becoming so swollen that the hack cannot cross them.

Mr. HOLMAN. It would seem quite clear from this statement that the sale of this property under a prior contract would extinguish any subsequent lien upon it. But it might be fairly gathered, from the fact that the Post-Office Department assumes its present ground, that the Government's right under the contract was not affected by this sale upon a prior encumbrance. There must be some additional fact; and therefore I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] whether this subject has been referred by the Post-Office Department to the Attorney-General for his opinion?

Mr. WADDELL. I do not think it ever has. The Postmaster-General seems to be acting under quasi instructions from the Quartermaster-General. The Postmaster-General is anxious to put on the service, and thinks it wrong that the people should be denied this privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. They may assume that the State of Tennessee——

Mr. WADDELL. It is a mere construction of law put upon this contract by the War Department.

Mr. HOLMAN. They may assume that the State of Tennessee was a part to the contract.

Mr. WADDELL. Pardon me. The State of Tennessee by its legislation has assumed all responsibility for the amount due the Government, and still they cannot get the mail on that route.

Mr. HOLMAN. One other question. The gentleman from North Carolina has the letter——

Mr. WADDELL. I have all the papers.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman quoted from a letter from the War Department.

Mr. WADDELL. I will have it read, if the gentleman desires it; I did not deem it necessary to take up that much time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be read.

Mr. DIBRELL. I have here the acts of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee granting aid to the railroads of the State, including this road; also the acts assuming liability in case the Government held a lien on the road, and prohibiting the company from giving any lien superior to the lien of the State of Tennessee. I will state further that when I came here in December last the Postmaster-General proposed to put the mails back upon this railroad, provided the contractors would take the chance for their pay. I went to see the Secretary of War, Mr. Belknap, and he had no objection; but, on going to the Quartermaster-General, I found that he objected.

Mr. WADDELL. I now ask that the Clerk read the letter which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
> SIR: In the matter of the request of Hon. G. G. DIBRELL, concurred in by Hon. D. M. KEY, that the order suspending the carrying of the mails on the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad be rescinded or suspended, I have the honor to report that in February and June, 1866, the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company purchased of the United States railway material to the value of $46,508.54, upon the terms and conditions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865. One of the conditions on which the property was sold to the railroad company was that all Government dues for carrying the mails should be retained and applied to the liquidation of the debt. The company accepted these conditions and received the property.
> Interest has accumulated upon the debt to the amount of $37,505.12, and payments have been made to the amount of $14.25, leaving due the United States December 1, 1875, $83,999.41.
> None of the postal earnings of the road have been paid over to this Department, and but a small sum, $5,054.37, has been earned, as the mails were not carried on the road prior to July 1, 1870, and have not been carried since June 30, 1873.
> Some time prior to July 1, 1870, the road being indebted to the State of Tennessee for bonds loaned to aid in the construction of the road, the governor of the State took possession of the road and appointed a receiver thereof; he then leased the road and the lessee commenced carrying the mails and claimed pay for so doing.
> On the 25th of August, 1871, a full statement of the case, setting forth the demands of the lessee for payment and the action of this Office in resisting those demands, also the fact that suit was pending against the company to recover the amount due the United States, was submitted to the Secretary of War.
> The Quartermaster-General gave his reasons for refusing to permit payment of the postal earnings to be made to the lessee, and asked for instructions as to whether he should permit the lessee to receive from the United States the money due from such earnings; whether executive orders should be obeyed and adhered to or the Post-Office Department advised to pay the money to the railroad company instead of retaining it to be applied to reduce the debt due the United States by the railroad company. The Secretary of War, on the 19th or September, 1871, replied as follows:
> "Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General. His action herein is approved and he is instructed to insist on the payment to his Department, according to contract, of all the postal earnings of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, until the indebtedness referred to is discharged."
> On the 15th day of July, 1871, the State sold the road to the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and the company subsequently sold it to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company.

On the 2d of July, 1873, the Quartermaster-General was informed by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that postal service on the road had been discontinued in consequence of the refusal of the Department to allow the postal earnings to be paid to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company.

On the 11th of July, 1873, the Second Assistant Postmaster-General referred to this Office a communication from Mr. Marbury, president of the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and said: "It is hoped that if possible some arrangement might be effected which will obviate the difficulties now existing and enable this Department to secure postal service on the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad."

This communication was submitted to the Secretary of War, with report, on the 29th of July, 1875, for instructions attention being invited to the report of 1871. The Quartermaster-General then said: "I cannot recommend that the Government yield to the railroad company in this matter; if this was the only company indebted to the United States and if, even in this case, there was beyond question other complete and ample security for the payment of the debt due the United States, I would, rather than cause trouble to the Post-Office Department in its postal matters, yield the point; but as it would be a precedent for other indebted companies to seize upon, I think the Department should adhere to its previous action."

To this communication the Secretary of War replied on the 4th of August, 1873, as follows: "The indorsement of the Secretary of War, dated September 19, 1871, on the Quartermaster-General's report of August 25, 1871, is adhered to."

The Secretary further directed that the papers be forwarded to Messrs. Perry and Matthews, counsel for the United States, to be considered in connection with the suit pending against the railroad company, and with request that the counsel will be pleased to communicate to this Department such suggestions regarding the claim now presented by the Memphis and Chattanooga Railroad Company as in their opinion the case demands.

The papers were all transmitted to Messrs. Perry and Matthews on the 6th of August, 1873, but no reply has been received.

The suit against the railroad company has not yet been tried, and it is thought that no trial should be had until after the expiration of one year from February 27, 1875, the limit to the time in which the debt of the company can be compromised under the act of February 27, 1875.

It is claimed by this Department that the rights of the United States are not affected by the sale of the road by the State of Tennessee; also, that those rights are not affected by any claim the company have for iron removed from the road by the United States during the war, as it was captured property.

The Acting Quartermaster-General does not recommend any modification of previous instructions of the Secretary of War on this subject.

The letter above referred to is herewith returned.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

RUFUS INGALLS,
Acting Quartermaster-General,
Brevet Major-General United States Army.

To the Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] withdraw his objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. Before withdrawing my objection, I wish to state that this measure involves a question of law as to the effect of the sale of this property under the prior lien of the State of Tennessee—whether that extinguished the arrangement made subsequently between this company and the Government in 1866. Now, the ground on which the counsel for the Government insisted that this lien was not affected by the sale by the State of Tennessee is not stated; but it does seem to me that the gentleman from North Carolina should have had this subject referred to the law officer of the Government to ascertain the ground upon which this claim of the War Department was asserted. It can only be asserted, I presume, upon the assumption that the State of Tennessee had acquiesced in the act of this company in entering into this contract with the Government. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether he does not consider that the question how far the State of Tennessee may have acquiesced in this act of the company so as to supersede its prior lien is a proper subject to be inquired into before the passage of this measure?

Mr. WADDELL. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Indiana that the State of Tennessee was no party to this proceeding in any sense. The iron was taken up from this road during the war by the Government and laid down upon the Chattanooga Railroad. After the war, this road having been stripped in that way, the Government loaned this iron.

But there is one consideration which seems to me a sufficient answer to all objections. What earthly good will it do for the Government to continue to occupy the attitude it has heretofore taken in this matter? The Government cannot force the new owners of the road to carry the mails; they have refused to do so. The Government is obliged to make a contract with them. What, then, is to be gained by refusing to pay the new lessees of the road for carrying the United States mails? What is accomplished by that, except to punish the innocent people of those ten counties by denying to them mail facilities? The former corporation, which was insolvent, has been sold out, and the Government can make nothing by withholding mail facilities from the people.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is another consideration——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is very irregular to have an objection reserved in this way while the debate upon the measure proceeds.

Mr. HOLMAN. Just one word before withdrawing the objection. Mr. Speaker, it is quite manifest that the Government has a suit pending to recover this $3,000, and the right of action of course is not affected by this proceeding. I hold, however—and I believe that this is beginning to be understood as the settled law of this country—that the Government of the United States under its constitutional authority to establish and regulate post-roads may require this company to transport its mails, paying, of course, in some form or other, a reasonable compensation. I am not disposed upon the facts presented to press my objection, although I should greatly have preferred that this question had gone to the law officer of the Government that he might have given a full opinion upon it.

Mr. WADDELL. If the Government recovers judgment in this suit, the State of Tennessee, under an act already passed, assumes all the responsibility.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the objection to the bill is withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is then before the House.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to say one word only. As a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, I wish to state that for one I do not concur in the recommendation of the majority of the committee.

Mr. WADDELL. It is very strange for the gentleman to say that. This is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. WADDELL. The committee unanimously agreed to this substitute.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. WADDELL. I refer the gentleman to every other member of the committee to say whether it is not the fact.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If such action was had, it was at some time when I was not present. The last time this matter was considered the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. AINSWORTH] and myself refused to concur.

Mr. WADDELL. This is not the original bill, but a substitute upon which we all agreed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADDELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 2922, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances for compensation to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlements of their accounts; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, upon final settlements hereafter made with collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to the 8th day of February, 1875, to make such additional allowances of compensation as he may deem just and equitable to such of said collectors as he, from the territorial extent of their collection districts, or from other proper considerations, may consider justly entitled thereto; but the total net compensation of any such collector shall not in any case exceed the rate of $4,500 per annum; provided that the power herein conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue for twelve months from and after the passage of this act and no longer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to put the bill on its passage at this time, and shall ask to have printed letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue (not wishing to detain the House by having them read) showing they both approve of the bill. The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 4, 1876.

SIR: Referring to House bill No. 2922 (Forty-fourth Congress, first session,) referred by you to this Office on the 3d instant, with request for an opinion as to the propriety of the passage of the same, I have the honor to return the said bill, and to say that if the same can be amended as indicated thereon, this Office will not be disposed to interpose any objection to the same becoming a law.

Respectfully,

D. D. PRATT, Commissioner.

Hon. B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 11, 1876.

SIR: I herewith return a bill (H. R. No. 2922) "to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlement of their accounts," which bill was left by you at this Department with the verbal request that it be returned to you with an expression of the views of the Secretary as to the propriety of its passage.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to whom the bill was referred, suggests certain amendments, which he has indicated thereon, and reports that as so amended he has no objections to make to its passage. A copy of the Commissioner's letter upon the subject is herewith inclosed.

I concur in the amendments of the Commissioner, and see no objections to the principle of the bill; but I think it may be well to call your attention to the fact that the law as it now stands authorizes the Secretary to make allowances for services rendered within a year past only upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, while it is proposed by this bill, in cases of allowances thereunder, to dispense with his recommendation.

Although no ill consequences are to be apprehended from this contemplated change, yet for the sake of consistency and for the purpose of preventing confusion of details in the settlement of these cases I would suggest that there should be uniformity of legislation in this particular.

I am, very respectfully,

CHAS. F. CONANT,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. ENGLISH.

Mr. YEATES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 708) for the relief of John M. English, of North Carolina.

The bill was read. It instructs the Secretary of the Interior to direct the pension agent at Raleigh, North Carolina, to issue a duplicate check, No. 8424, for $1,334, in favor of John M. English, for one lost in the mail on May 18, 1875; provided that the Secretary of the Interior be satisfied that the same has not been paid, and provided that said English shall first execute a bond and give sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to hold the United States harmless against the double payment of said check.

Mr. YEATES. A joint resolution identical in substance with this bill passed this House and went to the Senate. The Senate put it in the form of a bill. It has been again before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and they recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YEATES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NELSON AINSLIE.

Mr. SINNICKSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1269, a bill (H. R. No. 3500) granting a pension to Nelson Ainslie; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE HAGAN.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1625, a bill (H. R. No. 3501) granting a pension to Catharine Hagan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH D. STONE.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1566) granting a pension to Elizabeth D. Stone; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

M. A. AND D. G. NOBLES.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3502) granting a pension to Maggie A. Nobles and Daniel G. Nobles; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PHILIP ROHR.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3503) for the relief of Philip Rohr, of Virginia, for tobacco seized for the use of the Army; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ELLIS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following memorial and bill; and the same were laid upon the table and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The memorial of Wildey Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, for compensation for destruction of lodge and regalia by fire during the war; and

The bill (H. R. No. 733) for the relief of Frederick City and the banks thereof for losses occasioned by the confederate army, July 9, 1864.

THOMAS DAY.

Mr. ELLIS also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day, of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MILITARY POSTS ON YELLOWSTONE AND MUSCLESHELL RIVERS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers. The Committee on Military Affairs are unanimously agreed on this bill. I believe it is satisfactory to the Committee on Appropriations, and if there is no objection I would like to have it passed at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I must raise the point of order on that bill. Let it go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BANNING. I had made the bill to suit the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and I did not suppose he would have objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported adversely on the following bills; and they were laid on the table and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed.

The bill (H. R. No. 2136) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas R. Crosby; and

The bill (H. R. No. 1356) for an extension of the patent of Thomas A. Weston.

JOHN A. RICHARDSON.

Mr. CANDLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3505) for the relief of John A. Richardson, executor of Benjamin O. Jones, of Fayette County, Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVES OF JOHN STEEL.

Mr. CANDLER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3506) to authorize the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the legal representatives of John Steel, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CATE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. On my return here from Wisconsin, whither by courtesy of this House I had been absent for several days, I learned that during such absence a memorial of the Wisconsin Legislature had been introduced from the Speaker's desk, demanding an investigation of the right by which I occupy a seat on this floor.

I am, sir, too little acquainted with the rules by which the business of this body is governed and controlled to intimate that that ordinary and common courtesy and consideration due to members have not been observed in the presentation of this memorial. Neither will I allow myself to believe that any member of this body, for the purpose of obtaining any political advantage over me or to gratify the spite or malice of anybody, procured the presentation of the memorial in my absence. This memorial passed the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin more than sixty days ago, and might have been presented here in an open-handed, honorable way by somebody within a few days of its passage, if there was any real desire for an investigation, and the whole question determined long ago. But, instead of such reasonable and high-minded course having been pursued by those who are pushing this matter in the interest of party from behind, and too cowardly to come to the front, the memorial is allowed to float about the country, the subject of unfavorable comment toward me by the republican press, until finally it finds its way, like a thief in the night, into this House on the occasion of my first absence since the commencement of the session.

If I am not mistaken in my estimate of the motives and objects of the parties who, keeping in the background themselves, are using the Legislature to accomplish their purpose, they do not desire or expect an investigation, for they know what the result would be, but to create a popular prejudice against me at home, to assist them in recovering the three or four thousand majority their party has lost in the eighth district in the last two or three years.

The court did decide in the case referred to in the memorial that the board of county canvassers were guilty of fraud, but I was not a party to the suit or even referred to in it, neither did the court in any manner, by implication or otherwise, refer to me, and yet, by a skillful blending or association of the demand for an investigation with the allegation of fraud in the Wood County canvass and the remarks of the court, an impression is sought to be conveyed that I was the person charged with the fraud and that I am the person referred to by the court. In deciding the case against Baker, referred to in the memorial, the court say, in speaking of the action of the defendant, "This was a most flagrant and indecent violation of duty; too palpable for blunder, too corrupt for any mercy of construction." In the memorial this language is sought to be applied to me by alledging that—

> Mr. CATE received a certificate of election through the perpetration of an act which, unless the chief justice of the State of Wisconsin was in error in his judgment and conclusions, was a most indecent and flagrant violation of duty; too palpable for blunder, too corrupt for any mercy of construction.

And the whole aim of those draughting the paper seems to have been to create an impression that I had been guilty of a flagrant violation of the law, when it was well known that I was in entire ignorance of the facts of that canvass, it occurring thirty miles from my residence, and was wholly unknown to me until long after it occurred, and no man has been found bold and bad enough to charge me, except by innuendo and insinuation, with the frauds of that canvass, if any fraud there was, of which I had no knowledge.

These words in the memorial, italicized, purport to be the words of the court—"he who, by fraud or by willful disregard of his sworn duty, defeats the will of the people as expressed by their votes, commits a political crime next to treason and nearly akin to it." All very true, but to what feature of this contest do they apply; and why are they put in this memorial in italics for the purpose of attracting attention, giving to them a significant meaning? There can be no mistaking the design; it bears the ear-marks of the political trickster, the cowardly poltroon who strikes from behind and never from the front. And then when it is spread upon the record and distributed throughout the country at public expense the object of these worthies is accomplished. It was for these reasons that I desired to be present when the memorial should be presented, that I might object to it going into the RECORD in its present shape, for I do not believe this House would direct the printing of that portion which purports to recite the opinion of the Wisconsin court, because it can have no possible bearing upon any matter arising in this case, and for the additional reason that the only object of that portion of the memorial is to injure a member of this body. Nobody pretends that the opinion of the court is of any binding authority in this case, because not made in a cause in which I was a party, and also because this House and not the court is the absolute and sole judge of the election and qualification of its own members. And therefore so much of the memorial as recites the ruling of the court is impertinent and ought to be expunged from the RECORD.

The memorial and the debates in the Wisconsin Legislature while it was under consideration have been published in all the republican papers in the State, together with such comments as such a press is in the habit of making when seeking political capital. Therefore I desire to make a full and fair statement of all the facts having any connection with this somewhat extraordinary case, and I hazard the opinion that when I shall have made my statement—and I shall be careful to make no statement that will be contradicted even by my enemies—the House will agree with me that this is an extraordinary proceeding on the part of the Legislature sending this presentation here.

I might inquire what right the Legislature has to interfere in a matter of this kind; to demand an investigation of the right of a member to a seat on this floor, or to interfere in any respect in the question of the election or qualification of a member of Congress. But I care nothing about the naked right of the Legislature to interfere in this particular case, for I have always been willing to submit to any examination of the election under and by virtue of which I hold my seat here. I have evaded nothing, taken no undue advantage, but have at all times been free to express my willingness to go to any proper examination—have repeatedly, publicly and in private, challenged such an investigation; but nobody would come to the front. But the hirelings and bummers of party have kept up their dirty work of defamation and slander.

I shall be able to show that if this is a case at any time proper for investigation, the fault that an investigation has not been had is not mine. After the contest between myself and my opponent had been regularly entered upon I prepared the case for trial, made all the necessary preparation for taking the testimony, and was prevented by the action of my opponent himself in formally withdrawing from the contest. And afterward, when charged by unscrupulous persons with usurping an office to which I was not entitled, I offered to waive all advantage, if any I had, by reason of the abandonment of the contest by my opponent and go on and test the questions in dispute as if such abandonment had not been made; but nobody would accept this offer. Dr. McDill, on the expiration of his term as Representative in the Forty-third Congress, was appointed to an important State office, the duties of which he discharged some eight months before his death. And I assert that it is not true, as stated by a newspaper correspondent here, that Dr. McDill was induced to resign by reason of ill-health, but on the contrary, it was his free and deliberate act, and he occupied a seat here thereafter for nearly two months and until the adjournment of Congress, and from that time until the time of his death, in November, discharged the duties of an important and laborious office, the illness of which he died being of brief duration.

When the returns reached the office of the secretary of state, it was found that on the face of such returns I had 2 majority, and thereupon Dr. McDill, my opponent, sued out of the supreme court a writ of mandamus to compel the State convassers to count certain votes not returned to them, and which had been rejected by the county canvassers of Wood County. This was a matter wholly between McDill and the board of State canvassers, and to which I was in no wise a party. The contest between myself and McDill rested upon entirely different grounds, as I shall show; but the court decided that from the returns in the office of the secretary of state I was entitled to the certificate of election, leaving the question of the legality of votes rejected by the local canvassers to be settled between the parties affected thereby, and the certificate of election was by such order of the supreme court delivered to me.

The law of Congress governing in cases of contested election allows forty days after the canvass within which to give notice of contest, and within that time Dr. McDill gave me the proper notice. My answer was served within the time limited for that purpose, in which I claimed to have received at said election a majority of the legal votes, and that illegal votes had been cast and counted for the contestant. That Indians and half-breeds belonging to Indian tribes and yielding obedience to tribal government and authority, and in the annual receipt of annuities from the Government, had voted for the contestant in the counties of Ashland, Bayfield, and Douglas, and that in those counties no registry of the persons entitled to vote was made as was required by the laws of the State.

The answer was served on the contestant here in the city of Washington on the 8th day of January, 1875, and thereafter the case was at issue, and the testimony must have all been taken within ninety days next thereafter. The difficulty of preparing the case will be appreciated when it is understood that the locality where the facts set up in the answer transpired is two hundred miles from the residence of both myself and the contestant and separated by almost roadless forests from the balance of the district, the ordinary route of travel thereto from my house being a distance of four to five hundred miles; but notwithstanding it was in midwinter, I made the necessary preparations to take the testimony, and should have taken it within the time but for the action of my opponent; and I have good reasons to believe that from investigation and inquiry he became satisfied that my answer was true. At all events, on the 3d day of February I was served with this paper:

MADISON, February 3, 1875.

SIR: The undersigned hereby retracts and withdraws the notice served upon you on the 11th day of December, 1874, of a contest before the House of Representatives of the United States of the Forty-fourth Congress of your election to said Congress from the eighth congressional district of the State of Wisconsin at the general election of 1874, and all notices whatever of that import are herewith and hereby fully and completely withdrawn from said contest and any concern therein

ALEXANDER S. MCDILL.

Hon. GEORGE W. CATE.

But the secret history of this part of the contest is that McDill never authorized the contest at all, but it was instituted without his knowledge or direction in his absence from Wisconsin; and when he was informed of it, it met his disapprobation, and he at once countermanded the notice of contest. The Madison politicians would carry it on for political purposes and would use him for that purpose; but he was an upright, conscientious man, and being satisfied that I had an absolute and clear majority of the legal votes, his high sense of duty would not permit him to appear to contend for that to which he believed he had no just claim.

From the very first step, it has been the work of the politicians alone, those who dabble in the puddle-holes of politics for the money it brings, and whose corruptions and disreputable conduct generally have contributed materially in changing the popular vote of Wisconsin from a majority of 25,000 republican four years ago to a reform majority of several thousand at the last election, and it is probable that the disgust of Haman when he saw Mordecai sitting in the king's gate was mild compared with that of these gentlemen when they discovered an independent reformer sitting in the councils of the nation as the representative of the hitherto invincible eighth, the "iron brigade" in many contests, and failing to dislodge him, find compensation for their chagrin in throwing dirt and in unfounded insinuations which no man has dared to indorse.

The notice was filed with the Clerk of this House, where the notice of contest and answer were likewise on file, and thereafter I paid no further attention to the matter, supposing it to be at an end.

The Legislature of Wisconsin, then as now republican in both branches, was in session when the notice of abandonment of the contest was made, and all the facts connected with the election were well known, and had prior thereto been freely canvassed throughout the State, and especially at Madison after the meeting of the Legislature. The contest between my opponent and the State board of canvassers in the supreme court had given the history of the case great notoriety, but the Legislature adjourned without taking any action in the matter. It had not then occurred to its members, I suppose, that it was any of their business to interfere in the election of members of Congress.

After the canvass of the votes, and I think after the termination of the contest between myself and McDill, a litigation arose in the counties of Douglas and Wood between persons who were candidates for the office of county clerk, involving in the first-named county the right of certain persons (Indians) to vote and the question of compliance with the registry law, and in the latter county also the question of registry and the legality of the action of the county canvassers in rejecting the vote of a couple of towns in said county, by which Dr. McDill lost 38 votes, the unsuccessful candidate for the county office also losing by the same action. In the county of Douglas McDill had 69 majority over me, and the same was counted for him. The litigation in regard to the Douglas County vote resulted in the court declaring the vote of the entire county illegal, because of a failure to register as required by the law of Wisconsin.

In the Wood County litigation the court decided that the county canvassers erred in rejecting the vote of two towns or precincts in that county. To neither of these suits was I a party. The Wood County case is the same case referred to in the memorial.

The election law of Wisconsin requires that a registry of the voters shall be made before the election, and the supreme court has repeatedly held that the making of such registry is a condition precedent to holding an election at all.

In the county of Douglas, being one of the counties in which I had in my answer alleged the voting of persons belonging to Indian tribes, and also that no registry of the voters had been made, the court in the case just mentioned decided that the election was illegal because no registry had been made; and the fact is that throughout that region the registry law, the only safeguard against illegal voting, was entirely ignored and the gate-way to the polls thrown wide open.

This memorial recites the opinion of the court in the Wood County case, and upon the strength of that decision it is that an investigation is demanded. Giving to that case all that is claimed for it and McDill would be a gainer of 38 votes. Giving the same force to the decision of the circuit court in the Douglas County case, and McDill by that decision lost 69 votes, taken together increasing my majority by 31 votes. And no statement based upon any judicial determination can be made with any different result, and yet a republican majority in the Wisconsin Legislature, as if in ignorance of the fact that the entire election in Douglas County had been declared void by a court of competent jurisdiction, parade the speech of the court in the Wood County case before the public as though it is decisive of the whole question.

Let us see. When this memorial was first introduced in the Wisconsin Legislature it was presented in the senate in the precise form in which it now appears, but was amended in that body by incorporating into it a recital of the finding and judgment of the circuit court in the Douglas County case, because, as was said by senators, if it was proper to incorporate one case, it was but just to put in the other, as both were entitled to the same faith and credit; and, as amended, it passed the senate, which body is largely republican, showing that, uninfluenced by political considerations, the republican majority in that body were disposed to deal justly by a political opponent. But an intense partisanship ruled the assembly, republican by a small majority, and by a strict party vote the action of the senate in amending the memorial was repudiated, and the relation of the Douglas County case was stricken out, for which no other reason was ever assigned than the purely arbitrary reason that the majority desired to have it so.

My party friends in the Legislature desired that if any relation was to be made it should be a truthful and fair statement of the facts as the same were known to exist. It was well known to the Legislature that after the canvass of the votes it was discovered that a mistake of 10 votes against me was made by the county canvassers of Adams County in adding up the votes, and had been so certified to the secretary of state, and it was proposed to set out those facts in the memorial, because they were not disputed; but it was denied, though the mistake had been made by a republican board of county canvassers who were desirous of correcting their returns; and so a republican Legislature denied me a privilege that would have been accorded to the lowest accused, the privilege, not to say the right, that the memorial should contain all the material facts in the case, the undisputed facts; but instead thereof we have, as was said by Mr. Newcomber in the assembly, an information "partial in its statement of facts, partisan in its spirit, insulting in its insinuations, erroneous in its conclusions, and unworthy the Assembly." And so it was.

To show the contemptible, driveling spirit of party that controlled in this matter, and how unworthy a State Legislature, and also to show my own willingness to meet an investigation, I refer to the fact that when the the memorial was first introduced, perceiving that its principal object was to injure me in the public estimation through its base and truthless insinuations, because the opinion of the supreme court could have been introduced for no other purpose, I wrote at once to the Assembly, addressing my letter to the speaker in care of a member, requesting that so much of the memorial as recites the opinion and remarks of the court be omitted, and that I would make no opposition to the adoption of the memorial or to an investigation here, and that I would consent to a count of the rejected Wood County vote; which letter was read on the floor of the Assembly: but the proposition was rejected. There could be no mutilation of the bantling. The ring-masters would not give up the speech of the court on the subject of frauds in elections. That was the valuable part of the memorial; it they regarded as a great political "bonanza," an "eye-opener," so to speak, something that would electrify the people of my district next fall, and therefore could not be dispensed with, though they should accomplish all they pretended to desire, namely, an allowance of the rejected vote in Wood County.

With characteristic fairness this memorial attempts to confine the investigations of this body to the reasons for the rejection of the vote of two towns or precincts in Wood County, notwithstanding it was well known that the vote of those towns was not in controversy between McDill and myself, and that the rejection of that vote was not essential to my election.

What were the matters in contest between McDill and myself, and to which this investigation must extend if any investigation shall be had? In my answer to his notice I alleged that a large number of several bands of Chippewa Indians located on the south shore of Lake Superior had voted for McDill, giving the number, the band to which they belonged, and the place where the voting was had; and likewise that there was no registry as required by law. The last was investigated in the circuit court, and, as before stated, the court found that there was no registry and rejected the vote.

And in regard to the Indian vote, the proof will show not only that a large number voted at the general election in 1875, but also that for years the republican leaders in that hitherto isolated and sparsely settled region have been in the habit of helping out a candidate by the use of Indian votes. Some of the better class of republicans did not approve of this, because nobody pretends that persons belonging to Indian tribes are voters in Wisconsin. But the politicians did not see it in just that light; they knew that great advantage had resulted to their party by allowing negroes to vote, and appear to have thought it would be equally advantageous to utilize the Indian vote. It was wholly through republican sources that the voting of tribal Indians was exposed, for politics in that region is a close corporation, in which officers and shareholders are republicans; but there were a few who would not submit to such a plain and palpable violation of law, and had the nerve and independence to expose it; not that I would be understood as conveying the idea that all those who did not expose it approved of it.

As evidence of the feeling on the lake-shore in regard to this matter, I read one or two letters of the many received from that region all to the same import:

Judge CATE.

BAYFIELD, WISCONSIN, December 9, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Though a republican and supporter of Dr. McDill and have a desire to see him our Representative in the next Congress, yet my desire is based alone on the right he may have to his seat in said Congress by receiving a majority of the legal votes cast, which right I think extremely doubtful. In this county (Bayfield precinct) the vote for McDill was 175, the same number as shown on the poll-books, every ticket having thereon the name of McDill for Congressman eighth district. Of this number the poll-books will show the names of forty and perhaps fifty Indians and half-breeds, belonging to the Buffalo band of Chippewa Indians and living on the Red Cliff reservation. You will understand that I am not objecting to McDill, but to the principle of nolens volens in elections. This applies of course to our local candidates. This class of voters, Indians and half-breeds, are controlled almost wholly by whisky and other illegimate means and influences; consequently as long as this régime exists we will not have the better class of citizens control the interests of our county. Ashland County cast 214 votes. Of this number you received but 4. In the latter county is located Bad River reservation, whose occupants were permitted to vote at will, notwithstanding they are as illiterate and ignorant as the Digger Indians. Neither have they been declared citizens by any act of Congress or by State legislation, nor have either of those bands abandoned their tribal relations, but maintain full membership and acknowledge allegiance to their chiefs. If the vote between you and McDill is as close as reported, these illegal votes thrown out will seat you and secure a precedent of infinite value to the purity of the ballot and good morals on Lake Superior. Will be pleased to hear from you in regard to the matter, believing that if it benefits you we too will be benefited.

Extract from a letter dated at Lapoint:

Speaking of the election, the most of the voters were Indians and half-breeds, drawing pay from the Government. In Bayfield County more than half their voters were half-breeds and Indians living on their reservation. I objected to their voting here, but they were allowed to vote.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
County of Douglass, ss:

Richard Rief, of Superior in said county, being duly sworn, says he is a citizen and legal voter in said county; has resided therein over twenty years, and is personally acquainted with each and every of the persons herein named, namely—

Giving a large number of names, which are omitted—

That each and every of them are persons of Indian descent, and are members of the tribe of Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior, and belong to either the Fond du Lac band or to the Bois Fort band of said tribe, and are enrolled with the individuals of one or the other of said bands, and are now on the lists and pay-rolls and receive allowances of money and property under the treaties; and that deponent believes each and every of them voted for A. S. McDill for member of Congress at the general election in 1874.

After my answer was filed the subject was extensively discussed by the papers in the State, especially by those in the district, and I assert here that the fact of such voting has not at any time by anybody been denied. Have Indians or persons belonging to Indian tribes the right to vote? The constitution of the State of Wisconsin, in determining who shall be entitled to vote, includes "persons of Indian blood who have been declared citizens by act of Congress;" second, "civilized persons of Indian descent, not members of any tribe."

From this it of course follows that persons of Indian blood belonging to any Indian tribe are not voters unless declared citizens by act of Congress, and there is no pretense that any portion of the Chippewa Indians of Lake Superior have ever been declared citizens by act of Congress, and I conclude that the people of this country are not anxious to establish a precedent under which every Indian in the land may go unchallenged to the polls and untold mischief result. While the great body of the Indians and half-breeds are utterly unfit by reason of their ignorance to exercise intelligently the rights and privileges of citizens, though quite as intelligent as the average plantation negro, there are many persons of Indian blood, belonging to Indian tribes and acknowledging obedience to tribal authority, many such in the Lake Superior country within my district eminently qualified to fill almost any position to which a citizen may aspire, but who prefer to keep up their tribal relations, though it is hoped that such persons will at an early day dissolve their tribal relations for the higher and more important position of citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I have now hurriedly passed over the more important features of this matter, but I felt a delicacy in detaining the House for that purpose, and should not have done so had this memorial been presented in the ordinary way, and referred to the appropriate committee without being published to the world, and I am informed that the usual and ordinary practice is to refer such cases to a committee without printing. For these reasons I have felt justified in giving it a more extended notice. And because I believe this to be a move purely in the interest of party, designed for influence in the fall election in my district, and not at all to subserve the ends of justice, I desire that those who may have read this skillfully prepared memorial may know of its shameful withholding of facts, and its base and groundless insinuations against me.

There has been no desire for a speedy investigation by those who are moving in this matter, but it has been their intention from the first to procrastinate proceedings so that no investigation can be had this session, leaving it to be handled as a campaign weapon in all its force of misrepresentation and gross insinuations, and therefore it was that it was bandied about the Legislature from the beginning of the session to the end, and allowed to remain in the hands of the governor a couple of months longer until this session is so near its close as to render it almost impossible to determine the case at this session, involving as it will the finding of witnesses and then the taking of testimony in a remote region of the country. Why did not these parties appear and object to me being sworn in as a member of this House? Because that would have precipitated a determination of the controversy and exposed the hollow pretenses set forth in this memorial.

My desire is that this investigation be pushed with all possible diligence, and I assure the gentleman having this matter in charge that there will be no blocking of the wheels on my part; but on the contrary, every possible assistance. Let the committee be directed to send for persons and papers, for there is not time to prepare and pass a law for taking the testimony in such a case, and then giving the notices and taking the testimony at this session; but any course that will be acceptable to any gentleman who assumes its management will be agreeable to me.

This proceeding did not originate in my district through any feeling of dissatisfaction among the people there, but did meet with disapprobation from many republicans there, and was regarded by the people generally as a bold and wicked attempt to disgrace me for political purposes. The humblest citizen in my district might come here and question my right to a seat in this body and would be entitled to a respectful hearing, but nobody from my district has demanded any such thing at the hands of this House; but on the contrary I charge that this scheme was forced through the Legislature by a man who does not live in my district, but who assumes to hold the politics of Wisconsin in the hollow of his hand, and to set up and depose candidates for office at his pleasure, a bold unscrupulous man, who has supported the drooping cause of republicanism in Wisconsin for the last five years by levying vast sums of money from distilleries, gaugers, and store-keepers, the price of immunity from prosecution for violation of the revenue laws, with a full knowledge that such persons were continually manufacturing crooked whisky, and himself a public officer promising to stand between them and the Government. This is the precious scoundrel who was able to manipulate his party in the Wisconsin Legislature in this matter, as before stated, in the interest of those who are anxious to "stand by" their country in these Halls in the place I occupy; but I refer with pride to the fact that there were in both houses high-minded republicans who could not be dragooned into supporting the memorial, characterizing it as a piece of political clap-trap to which they would not give their assent. Asking pardon of the House for occupying so much time, I submit the entire direction of the matter to the committee having it in charge.

Mr. CASWELL. I ask permission to say a word in reference to what has been said by my colleague who has just made a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman proceeding? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire only a moment for the purpose of relieving my colleague from some impressions which he seems to have and which really have no foundation whatever, but what I suppose to be a misapprehension. He criticises the fact that the memorial was presented to the House in his absence, and I suppose in doing so he refers to the action of some members of the delegation from Wisconsin.

Mr. CATE. I impute nothing to them at all in the matter. I am informed by my colleague, [Mr. RUSK,] in whom I have great confidence, that the memorial reached the Speaker's desk in some way without any action of any member of the delegation.

Mr. CASWELL. My friend has anticipated much of what I was about to say, that the memorial came to this House through the hands of the Speaker. No member of the Wisconsin delegation has ever in any manner, to my knowledge, interfered with it. The memorial passed the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, but no member of this House has had any part in it. The gentleman reflects severely upon the republican party of that State and perhaps upon the members of that party in this House.

Mr. CATE. No, I did not say a word against my republican colleagues here.

Mr. CASWELL. I will not be severe on the gentleman at all if he will allow me to proceed.

Mr. CATE. Not at all; but I do not allow you to misrepresent me. I have made no intimation that my colleagues on the other side have acted unkindly or interfered in this matter. In my judgment, they had no part or parcel in it.

Mr. CASWELL. I am obliged to the gent leman for his courtesy

I was in doubt before whether he did not intend to reflect upon the members of the republican party here. He passed a criticism upon some members of the party in the State, and said this memorial had been traveling about the country subject to comment before it was sent here. Let me say that neither the republican party of the State of Wisconsin nor the governor of the State had any hand in the suppression of the memorial, but it did slumber in the hands of the secretary of state, who ought to have forwarded it to this House.

Mr. CATE. Allow me to interrupt you. The memorial never went to the office of the secretary of state. It went to the office of the governor—the Legislature of Wisconsin is republican—and was by the governor transmitted here. You will see by an inspection of the memorial that it never has been in the office of the secretary of state.

Mr. CASWELL. I think my colleague is unnecessarily stirred up about this matter. I do not charge that its suppression was the willful act of the secretary of state; but when my colleague charges upon the republican party of that State, and especially upon the executive, that the memorial was suppressed by them, I repeat that it slumbered in the hands of the secretary of state until a few days before it was laid upon the Speaker's table. I was so informed by the governor, and I cannot be mistaken nor deceived about the action of the secretary, nor in the law of the State which requires that all bills and memorials passed by that body should go directly into the hands of the secretary of state; and if I am not mistaken this memorial bears the impress of his seal upon it. I am informed that it passed into the secretary's hands immediately upon its passage, as every one who has served in a legislative body knows it must for record, and there it slumbered until the governor's attention was called to it a few days before it reached this House. I intend no reflection upon the secretary of state, who is a political friend of my colleague. Whether its retention in his office was an act of inadvertence or not I do not know. I make no complaint upon that point.

My colleague made a statement that some time ago Wisconsin was republican by 20,000 majority and that at the last election it gave several thousand democratic majority. Has he forgotten that for the last two years the Legislature of that State has been republican and that at the last election we returned to the executive chair a republican governor? I concede that the democratic party did a few years ago try the experiment of reform and carried the State, but the people have made haste to correct their error.

Mr. SEELYE. I call for the regular order.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House for printing the addresses made in the Senate and the House on the death of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. Pending that motion, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] yield for that motion?

Mr. BLOUNT. No, sir.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of commissioned and warrant officers at sea, on shore, on special service, and of those on the retired-list and unemployed, and for the actual expenses of officers traveling under orders, and for pay of the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, including men of the engineers' force, and for the Coast Survey service, seventy-five hundred men, $6,250,000. And hereafter enlistments in the Navy shall cease until the number of enlisted men is reduced to seventy-five hundred: Provided, That section 1417 of the Revised Statutes shall be amended so as to read as follows.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$6,200,000" and inserting the following:

Five million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And so much of the act of June 16, 1874, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, as provides that only actual traveling expenses shall be allowed to any person holding employment or appointment under the United States while engaged in public business as is applicable to officers of the Navy so engaged, is hereby repealed; and the sum of eight cents per mile shall be allowed such officers while so engaged, in lieu of their actual expenses.

Mr. Chairman, the first proposition relates to the pay of the Navy. I yesterday called the attention of the House to the fact that the note in reference to the amount of money required for the pay of the Navy, as estimated by the Fourth Auditor, was clearly an error. There has been no satisfactory explanation given, and I cannot conceive that there is any. For this reason the committee have thought that there might be a considerable reduction, amounting to nearly $600,000.

Furthermore, a table on page 15 of to-day's RECORD, furnished to me by the Secretary of the Navy, discloses the fact that a very large proportion of the officers of the Navy who are not on sea service are on what is termed other duty pay, instead of being, as the committee think they might be, either on waiting orders or on furlough. We have thought that the abuse in this particular grew largely out of the fact of the influence of these officers and their importunities for higher pay, and we have felt that there was but one remedy—the reduction of the appropriation itself.

Mr. O'NEILL. I may perhaps, before taking my seat, offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] I hope there will be no reduction in the amount generally appropriated in this bill; and I hope before we get through with this paragraph to be able to have put to it a clause of this kind, following the amount of the appropriation:

But especially for continuing the construction of certain naval stations and navy-yards for which appropriations have been made in former years.

Mr. Chairman, in the limited time I am to speak I design to say a few words upon the question raised by the Committee on Naval Affairs for abolishing the League Island navy-yard; and I wish to speak promptly, quickly, and to the point without any preliminary remarks.

In the first place, my friend from New York, [Mr. WILLIS.] who addressed the committee yesterday, made a reply for which I do not wish to call him to account, but to which I propose to call the attention of the committee. In response to an inquiry made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] the gentleman from New York replied:

It is not my business to travel around, after the manner of clowns, looking at what may be in Boston, or what may be in Philadelphia, or sundry other small towns.

Meaning it was not his business, he being a member of the Naval Committee and in the performance of duty, to go to the different navy-yards of the country and look at them for himself, he being very prominent in the effort to reduce the number of navy-yards. I believe, with the exception perhaps of about one visit to the Brooklyn navy-yard, which is very near the district he has the honor to represent upon this floor, the gentleman has never seen any of the great navy-yards of this country. I want to say to him that twelve years ago, having then the honor of being a member of this House with my colleagues from the city of Philadelphia, who then began to discuss the advantages of the adoption of the League Island navy-yard by Congress as a proper place for an iron-clad naval station, I believe all of us—I know I did—visited the several navy-yards within a fair distance of the localities from which we came. I recollect distinctly at that time going to the Brooklyn navy-yard, to the Boston navy-yard, and to New London.

I had not been at the Brooklyn yard since I was a boy. Upon my later visit I saw there, Mr. Chairman, some of the disadvantages to which the gentleman referred at such length yesterday in his criticism upon League Island. I observed them closely, and I do not forget them to this day, although twelve years have elapsed, and I want to say to the gentleman right here, in order to give him some idea of the locality of the Brooklyn navy-yard, (for I do not think he knows how it is located and how its territory is made up,) that it is time for him to have the information.

Does he know that it is composed of two portions of land, and that one of them is Cobb Dock, an island? I wish to inform him that right in front of the Long Island side of the Brooklyn navy-yard lies this island, and that hundreds of yards of it have been wharfed in in the most expensive manner so as to keep the water of Wallabout Bay from overflowing parts of it. This had long been a necessity for making it useful for naval purposes. No one complained of the skill of the engineers who planned and accomplished this work of years. Across Wallabout Bay, on the Long Island side, is the other and larger portion of the Brooklyn navy-yard. If I am wrong in my description I would like to be corrected by any member of the committee. On this shore or front many hundreds of yards of stone wall have been built to keep out the flowing tides, or else the ground upon which the navy-yard is located, or many acres of it, would be at intervals covered with water to the great interruption of naval work to be done there—flowing water, plenty of it, until artificial means were adopted to prevent it. Why, forty years ago there was a large mill-pond covering acres of land right through the middle of the yard on the Brooklyn side. Did the gentleman ever know that? How many thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars did it take to fill up that immense lake? How many millions out of the $20,000,000 he says the construction of that yard has cost did it take to drain the land and pile it so that it could be safe and solid enough for the necessary buildings, shops, and other structures to be constructed upon it?

A navy-yard cannot be built up without the expenditures of large sums of money, and no one will pretend that it can who knows anything at all about such Government establishments and who desires to see us in such condition as will enable us to build, equip, and man vessels of war ready to meet the world in arms. The Brooklyn navy-yard is a great establishment, has accomplished and will continue to accomplish much in the construction and repair of a navy, and I desire to aid in voting for it sufficient appropriations for its continued improvement.

It does not matter whether the naval station be located upon high land or upon low land; you have either to fill up or to cut down. When you establish a naval station you cannot build a wharf, you cannot construct a dock, without cutting down the high ground or filling in the low ground. You cannot help resorting to artificial means. You must use engineering skill, and through years of planning and with the expenditure of money the result will be a navy-yard commensurate with the requirements of the Republic. As it has been with the Brooklyn navy-yard and is still to some extent, so must it be with the League Island navy-yard. You must overcome any natural disadvantages by the genius of the civil engineer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired and debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I move a formal amendment, and will yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL. I thank the gentleman from Texas for his courtesy. I am necessarily compelled to run over my points rapidly, and in this hurried debate I will keep very closely to my subject and to facts. Perhaps under the circumstances condensation will be an advantage. My desire is to persuade by argument and not to deceive by imagination.

The gentleman from New York spoke of the communication of the Brooklyn navy-yard with the whole world. What does he mean by that? There is not a railroad near the Brooklyn navy-yard save the Long Island Railroad, which begins and ends on Long Island, whereas League Island has the closest railroad communication with all parts of the country, north, south, east, and west. Everything needed at that navy-yard can be transported by railroad to the very ground, to the very entrance, right to its docks and piers, to its shops and wharves, without transshipment over rivers and sounds, and it has the very great advantage, especially as a navy-yard for iron-clads, of being within but a very few miles of iron and coal, they literally being at its very doors.

Does the gentleman know how Philadelphia is located in reference to the great railroad arteries of the country? The railroad system really centers there, and freight intended for League Island is not compelled to break bulk, but will be taken upon the cars to the very locality upon its grounds where the material is to be used. Both the railroad and canal communication with Philadelphia is perfect and complete, and brings her in unbroken intercourse with the most distant limits of our land.

The report of the commission of naval officers, to which the gentleman referred yesterday, I find by referring to the document itself, was made in January, 1862, fourteen years and more ago. My colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] in the eloquent remarks delivered last night, very pointedly referred to its contents, and I wish the gentleman from New York had been present to have heard him. I am not going to abuse the Brooklyn navy-yard. I think it is necessary, but I do not wish the gentleman to get up deliberately to criticise what he knows nothing about—to criticise a naval station which he himself confesses he has never visited. Does he not know that upon League Island there are nearly five hundred acres of fast land? If he does not, let him refer to the debates of past Congresses and to well-authenticated documents, and he will learn for himself that farming was carried on there for years, and a wall was built there years and years ago by private owners to prevent overflow when the river occasionally rose to an unusual height, and there was danger of the low lands. To this day many acres of the Brooklyn navy-yard are overflowed by the tide. I have been there a number of times, not so often within the last few years, and I have seen the water a foot or two deep over the first floors of many of the shops. By the expenditure of the $20,000,000 there, I suppose that by this time there may have been an improvement in that respect. Still there are a number of acres of marsh unreclaimed, and much water on the land where it should not be.

Then the gentleman from New York speaks of iron-clads being brought to the Brooklyn navy-yard for repairs, and says they can be taken up the Hudson River where they will be in fresh water. Does the gentleman know how far the salt water extends up the Hudson River?

Mr. WILLIS. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania state that.

Mr. O'NEILL. At least forty miles above the city of New York the water of the Hudson River must be more or less salt water. And what I claim here, and what the country claimed when League Island was accepted as a naval station, was that we had a locality in fresh water upon the Delaware, and where also in the back channel fleets could lie and where fleets of iron-clads have been moored since the close of the war or laid up to avoid the rot and rust which would be caused by their remaining in salt water, as there is at Brooklyn.

Now, sir, so far as the protection afforded by a naval station from foreign or other enemies is concerned, the very fact stated by the gentleman, the distance of League Island from the ocean being above eighty miles, shows the complete protection that is afforded. I will tell the gentleman a bit of history if he does not know it. During the revolutionary war, during the fall of 1777, the British fleet approached the capes of the Delaware. It took that fleet six long weeks to come to the mouth of the Schuylkill River, at Fort Mifflin, on the Pennsylvania shore, then called Mud Fort, where vessels of both sides were engaged as well as the fort, while on the Jersey shore the battle of Red Bank was fought. For six long weeks the enemy's ships were kept back by the citizens along the banks of the bay and river by their knowledge of the channel and by temporary obstructions; whereas during all that long contest the fleets of France, our friend, and England, our enemy, were hovering along the shores of Long Island. An enemy's fleet at Sandy Hook and one commanding the entrance of Long Island Sound could keep New York so shut up that a vessel could not get out. History tells us that the Delaware Bay and River were a safe resort for our gallant cruisers during that war. In the war of 1812 a British fleet made no effort to approach Philadelphia, or scarcely to show itself off the entrance to Delaware Bay.

Mr. WILLIS. It occurs to me that it is hardly necessary for anything to be added to what I have already stated in behalf of the proposition submitted by myself to recede League Island to the original grantor, the city of Philadelphia. If any one were disinclined to vote in support of this measure, here is a reason which should dispose of such disinclination. The House last night listened to the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] the high lord admiral of the United States of America, who is no less familiar with the shipping interests of this country——

Mr. PIPER. I call the gentleman to order. We have no lords in the United States.

Mr. WILLIS. By courtesy.

Mr. PIPER. Not by courtesy.

Mr. WILLIS. Who understands no less what pertains to the naval interests of the country than he does the profound system of finance, and the yet profounder doctrine of home protection. And his observations upon this subject are entitled to the same weight and to the same credit, because they are no less profound and philosophical than those which concern the question of the finances and the tariff. That gentleman last night in his remarks stated, after comparing himself to the fair Desdemona, a comparison with which I shall not venture to join issue:

> I do perceive here a divided duty. I feel to-night that, as a Philadelphian, I would be ready, if it were possible, to overwhelm Congress with my thanks if it would reconvey to Philadelphia these two and a quarter miles of its best river front, shutting its main avenue, Broad street, from access to tide-water.

Philadelphia comes here as a suppliant through its eloquent Representative. I pray you, gentlemen, let League Island be receded to the city of Philadelphia, and the people of the United States spared the expenditure of sixty-odd millions of dollars. Of course after the eloquent gentleman had presented himself before the committee and announced that I understood nothing about naval affairs, and that he was here as a witness to testify how much the country owed such Representatives as did not understand the subject-matters of legislation, I was utterly demolished. I had, sir, expected in the event of the election of another democratic President to be called perhaps to preside at the head of the Navy, or in the event of war to be put in command of a fleet. But these beautiful anticipations have forever vanished, and for all this I have to thank my profound, sagacious, statesmanlike friend from Philadelphia, who does understand exactly what are the requirements and needs of the Navy. But, Mr. Chairman, not one word has been said in refutation of the facts that were yesterday urged in behalf of this proposition. It still remains an undoubted and irrefutable fact that League Island is two and a half feet beneath high-tide water-mark; that in the event of its being made into a navy-yard, a piece of land one mile in length by four hundred and forty-four feet in breadth must be covered by nine feet of land, of solid earth. It still remains a fact that the Schuylkill and the Delaware are annually crowded and blockaded with ice, and all the eloquence of the gentleman from Philadelphia has not availed to move the city of Philadelphia one-half mile nearer to the sea than it was the day before yesterday.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. I prefer not just now.

In anything that I may say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] on this subject, I wish the members of the House to divest themselves of any favorable feeling derived from the fact that I represent a district in the immediate neighborhood of League Island, and confine any consideration they may give to the facts I present.

Of course I have a natural feeling for that ground, and during a long series of years I have advocated a navy-yard at that point, and finally success was reached in this respect. It was after various reports by persons who had experience and who understood the subject and who took the trouble to go to the ground and examine it.

The first point in reference to this matter is as to the location of the yard there in connection with iron-clads. Mark you, that our iron-clad navy was not brought to prominence until the period of the rebellion; before then we had but a wooden navy. The water at this point is fresh, and which is absolutely essential to the floating of iron-clads, and is also necessary to their rendezvous and location when out of service. The next material fact is that there we find the depot for the delivery of coal and iron, saving the cost of transportation of the raw material. In England the ship-yards have in a measure left the Thames and have been transferred to the Clyde, because there the iron and coal are put into the yards and come out iron-clad vessels to defend British rights. So with League Island; we can put the iron and coal into League Island as raw material and send you out an iron-clad vessel.

Another point in favor of that location is that we have in the immediate neighborhood a community of skilled mechanics, and in case any controversy arises between this country and other nations we can in an hour summon the most skilled mechanics without limit as to numbers. The gentleman has objected to this yard because it requires to have some part of it walled in. He alleges that a portion of League Island is below high-water mark. I want to say in that connection that there is hardly a navy-yard that has not had to have land made by piles. I wish that the gentleman from New York could have been with me a few years ago when I was studying the building up of the great and renowned city of Amsterdam, with its three hundred bridges and its canals instead of streets, the entire city built on piles; and the bravest act in history was the act of Holland. In order to save her domain her citizens and defenders opened the gates and let in the water, thus to overflow her country and drown out her invaders.

There is one other point in favor of the safety of League Island. New York, of course, in case of war with any foreign power, would have to have the whole power of the nation brought to bear for its protection; and while we should have to protect New York City we should at the same time have to protect the navy-yard at Brooklyn. I tell the gentleman that in this age of torpedo and war experience there is not an officer in the navy of any nation in the world who would attempt to approach the navy-yard at Philadelphia. Nothing could be more certain than that if they did they would never sail in return over the waters by which they had come.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise in a penitential mood. I desire forgiveness at the hands both of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WILLIS] and of the House. I had no thought last evening that I was crushing his young ambition. I certainly did not intend to do so wanton a thing. I knew that he dreamed of future glories in connection with the Navy; I saw that he had begun at the foot of the ladder, but was sure that he would, if his valued life was spared, reach the topmost round, and he must not be discouraged by anything I have heedlessly said in reference to his remarks of yesterday. He hoped, so he tells us, to become Secretary of the Navy. I have no doubt that he may attain that position, because I have heard among the traditions of that Department that a long time ago a Secretary of the Navy, who had been selected from the interior of the country, had been installed in office. He was taken by some of the naval officers on board ship. He was in his new domain, and as he dauntlessly paced the deck he came upon an open hatchway. Looking down into the depths of the ship he was surprised, and, in tones expressive of alarm, exclaimed, "God bless me, the thing is hollow; let us get on terra firma as soon as possible!" Yet it is said he became quite used to such dangers, and made an excellect Secretary; and if the gentleman from New York will spend a few years in reading naval reports and will consort with sailors and the officers of the Navy, study the topography of the yards and stations and their uses, he will, I doubt not, shine as a leader of the Naval Committee, and that every old salt will hail him as a great man when he shall become Secretary.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DANFORD. I renew it.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, I desire to call attention to the fact that while the bill provides for a further reduction of the pay of the Navy, it provides also for a restoration of mileage at eight cents instead of ten cents.

Mr. DANFORD. The purpose I have, Mr. Chairman, in rising is to oppose the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the proposition of the Committee on Naval Affairs to reduce the Navy from eighty-five hundred to seventy-five hundred men, and in this connection I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have now upon the various cruising stations but four vessels upon the European stations; that we have but seven upon the Asiatic stations; that we have but three upon the South Pacific stations and two upon the North Pacific station; that we have but four upon the South Atlantic station, and had but fifteen on the North Atlantic station at the time of the last report of the Secretary of the Navy. Take these foreign cruising stations and it is not possible for the protection and in the interest of our commerce abroad to withdraw a single vessel from the Pacific station, or from around the South American states. It is with those countries that we are attempting to build up a commerce at this time, and in order to build up and protect that commerce it is necessary that we should keep upon the waters of those countries certainly the complement of vessels now abroad. If this amendment be adopted we must necessarily reduce the number of ships in commission, and in doing this the committee will find it necessary to reduce the number of ships in commission in the home squadron. Now, a word upon that subject. I have here a list furnished me by the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting of the number of vessels in commission. They are manned by eighty-four hundred and fifty-two men all told. Our iron-clads, some fourteen or fifteen in number, have just one-half their proper complement of men—fifty, instead of one hundred.

My attention was attracted last evening by the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] who said that almost the only protection of the cities upon the Gulf, including the city of New Orleans, against a foreign enemy must be afforded by our monitor navy. These monitors are now in commission with one half their proper complement of men. In case of an outbreak of hostilities the nucleus of force upon these monitors would furnish the means for putting them in perfect fighting condition in a few days. If they go out of commission and are laid up it will take weeks, perhaps months, to put them in proper condition in case of need.

I consider it bad policy to reduce the number of men in the Navy if by that reduction we shall reduce the number of vessels in commission. We have at this time no more vessels in commission than are necessary for the protection of our commerce abroad and for our safety at home.

In this connection I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. The first part of the letter refers to other matters connected with his Bureau, but the latter part refers to the subject upon which I am now speaking.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
Washington, May 15, 1876.

SIR: The inclosed statements exhibit the details of the appropriation for equipment of vessels and contingent under this Bureau for the year 1876-'77 as estimated for by the Bureau. Any reduction of this estimate necessitates a pro rata reduction of the naval force afloat. This estimate is based upon the fact that eight ships will go out of commission during the coming fiscal year, owing to expiration of terms of service of their crews and that these ships are to be replaced with the same number of new ships, now nearly ready for their outfits. The estimate for labor also includes the labor necessary for the manufacture of rope and other articles, such as chains, anchors, and galleys, and it is difficult to see how the work of this Bureau in fitting out any vessels at all can be carried on if the Washington and Charlestown navy-yards, where these articles are manufactured, are to be closed as contemplated by the House appropriation bill.

Your attention is also solicited to the appropriation contingent under this Bureau of $45,000 for the next fiscal year. This appropriation has always been too small for its object, and the Department has frequently been cramped on this account. There has been expended this year the sum of $60,000 for transportation alone. It is more economical to send men to distant stations than to bring the ships home; particularly is this the case in China. The Kearsarge on that station will have her crew changed during the coming year at a cost probably of one-half the amount appropriated.

I also inclose a statement of disbursements for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, estimated up to that date. It will be observed that the Bureau has purchased a very small amount of canvas. This has been owing to stock on hand. Consequently this article, as well as many others in the equipment, has been diminished in quantity, and larger purchases will be absolutely necessary for the coming year unless, as before stated, there is to be a reduction of force afloat.

I also refer you to the list of vessels in commission, before forwarded to you, and wish to state that any reduction of men in the Navy (from eighty-five hundred to seventy-five hundred) as contemplated by the appropriation bill will lead to reduction of ships afloat, as the complements of crews have been reduced to the lowest point consistent with efficiency.

The iron-clads, you will observe, are only half manned, and this is found to be the only way of keeping these ships, not only ready for use but to prevent them from going to decay. The money thus expended on the men is more than saved by the repairs they would be sure to require if called into service on an emergency.

If Congress insist upon this reduction, then I hope that at least the Navy will be given five hundred boys for training-ships, as asked for by bill presented by Hon. Mr. WILLIS, of the Naval Committee.

Since making the estimate in September last for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, for $1,500,000 under equipment, considerable work has been done and material furnished for the standing rigging and outfits of some of the ships to be fitted out during the ensuing fiscal year, in view of which fact a reduction of $350,000 might be made in the estimate.

B. W. SHUFELDT,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. LORENZO DANFORD,
House of Representatives.

During the reading of the letter the time of Mr. DANFORD expired; but Mr. BURLEIGH took the floor and yielded his time, in order that the letter might be read.

Mr. DANFORD. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. HALE. I renew the amendment, not for the purpose of speaking upon the question of navy-yards, but for the purpose of speaking upon the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] who has charge of this bill. When we reach the portion of the bill relating to navy-yards I shall move to insert "Kittery" as one of the yards to be maintained.

I propose now to speak to the subject of the pay of the Navy. I fear that my friend from Georgia, in moving to reduce the appropriation a half a million of dollars, has gone too far. I believe he is mistaken as to what is needed for the pay of the Navy for the coming fiscal year. The gentleman himself, in his excellent speech of yesterday, gave us a table of expenditures in the Navy Department in their different branches for some years preceding the war when the naval establishment was considerably smaller than it is now. In 1860 the pay of the Navy was $5,126,547.20; a sum only $600,000 smaller than the gentleman now proposes for the pay of the Navy for the coming fiscal year.

Since that time the force of the Navy, so far as the officers are concerned, has been largely increased; it is one of the legacies that we inherited from the war. The gallant men who maintained the integrity of the flag, who were raised by promotion to higher ranks for their deeds of valor, receive to-day higher pay than the officers of the Navy received before the war. We have given to the officers of the Navy additional grades; we have made them admirals and rear-admirals, and we have done it not grudgingly.

Furthermore, by the act of 1873 it was provided, in reference to the retired list, (and this was not done grudgingly,) that the retired officers who were placed upon that list for meritorious services performed in the cause of their country should receive a larger proportion of active pay than retired officers received before the war. As a matter of course this has increased the demand upon the pay fund from year to year. I do not think that the increase of $600,000 from that time, which the gentleman provides for in his amendment, is sufficient. It may be that the Secretary of the Navy could get along with the appropriation if it was made $5,000,000 in round numbers; that would be a reduction of one and a half millions from the bill as reported by the committee. I move therefore to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia so as to make the amount $6,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. My colleague on the Committee of Appropriations [Mr. HALE] calls attention to a table that I presented yesterday in my remarks, and to that portion of it which relates to the year 1859. In that year the number of men in the Navy was just the same as it is during the current year.

Mr. HALE. Of enlisted men?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, of enlisted men.

Mr. HALE. That is so.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman will take the pains to refer to the report of the present Secretary of the Navy for 1873 and 1874, he will find that the Secretary claimed that the number of officers of the Navy then was not greater than before the war.

Mr. HALE. The aggregate number is not. The higher ranks are larger.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is just what he claims is not the case. I know that the highest grades of officers were not in existence before the war; but he makes the general statement.

Again, if a comparison is sought, instead of taking the table for 1859, the table for 1857 should have been taken, in which the number of men is exactly the same as proposed in this bill, and the amount then appropriated was $4,241,321.25; and our proposition, it will be seen, is several million dollars in excess of that.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I put this reduction distinctly on the ground that before the war there were and at this time there are too many officers receiving a rate of pay which they ought not to receive. It is of no importance, so far as this House is concerned, when this abuse commenced, whether before or since the war. The question is, Does it exist now; and, if so, is it not the duty of this House to correct it?

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] has seen fit to regard this amendment as involving a reduction in the pay of the men, which it really does, I take occasion to say that prior to 1857 we had exactly the same number of men that we are now proposing in this bill. At that time our commerce was larger than it is now. There was no trouble then in protecting our commerce. From whom does our commerce require to be protected? Have our troubles been with the great nations of the earth? Have they not been with some little power here or there? Never did our Navy prove inadequate to meet promptly the demands of our commerce. All that this measure of reduction amounts to is the withdrawing of a few vessels from our cruising stations. If our trade with China and Japan requires the presence of the vessels which are now there, let the withdrawal be made from other points.

Reference is made to our commerce in the Gulf. Why, sir, who is alarmed about our commerce there? Is there any present danger? Is there any prospective danger? Trouble with foreign powers does not spring up in a moment. It is always the result of much negotiation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I would not have sought to occupy the attention of the committee at the present moment but for a remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] my colleague on the committee, in which he conveyed the intimation that the Committee on Naval Affairs had made a recommendation similar to that of the Committee on Appropriations, reducing the number of men. They have in point of fact made no such recommendation. I speak therefore solely for myself while I state that I very fully and cordially concur with the suggestion emanating from the Committee on Appropriations.

In my judgment there is no necessity for any larger number of men in the United States Navy; and when my friend brings to the attention and consideration of this committee a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting stating that if the reduction be made it will be necessary for some vessels now afloat in the cruising service to be called home, I must in reply call attention to the fact that in the European, Asiatic, and Pacific squadrons there are to-day no more vessels than there were prior to the war, while in your domestic or home squadron, or North Atlantic squadron, as it is termed, there are twenty-four vessels. Why are those twenty-five vessels now in commission? For what purpose are they cruising around your borders from the city of Philadelphia to Key West? Is it that the officers may enjoy larger pay than they would otherwise receive? Is there any demand that there should be in this region as large a fleet as ever was under the command of an admiral at any time in the history of your Government? Sir, there is no necessity for those twenty-four vessels being thus engaged. It is simply an expensive amusement, if not a fraud upon the Government of the United States, that those vessels should be in service now.

Let me say further that in this day of progress, when with the electric flash we can reach instantly the most distant parts of the world, the day of squadron service should be terminated. Instead of the Secretary of the Navy hunting three or four months to find a vessel that he may order to a given point, let him keep his vessels in hand at home; and whenever he finds occasion for a vessel at a given point, he can send it promptly where it is required. If he were informed to-day of a difficulty upon the South Pacific coast and of the necessity of sending a vessel there, he could by means of the telegraph send a vessel from San Francisco or Mare Island and have redress made more promptly than under the present squadron service.

Mr. PIPER. Would it not be better to have the ships at the points where they are required than to send them there by a thirty or forty days' voyage? I say it is better to have the vessels at those islands or places where difficulty is likely to occur.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. How will you reach them? Who is to take control or give orders? The Secretary of the Navy or the President of the United States must be communicated with and his orders received in return. Suppose a difficulty should occur to-day at a distant point in the Mediterranean. The Secretary of the Navy must find out where Rear-Admiral Worden is and telegraph to him. He may not be in port; and there may be a delay of a month before that admiral can be reached. Why should not the Secretary keep his navy in hand, thus relieving the country of expense? Whenever an insult is offered to our flag or a wrong done to our commerce, why should he not turn loose from our own shores whatever force may be necessary to secure redress? Such a system would be equally efficient and much more economical.

But, sir, that is a different idea. I simply intended to reply to the suggestion of my colleague that the present occasion, when there are eighty-four hundred on board our vessels, is an extraordinary one created by the Secretary of the Navy within the last three or four months.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the naval appropriation bill now before us for consideration no appropriation is made for the civil establishment of the navy-yard at Kittery. As I believe that to be one of the most important in the country, I will briefly state my reasons why appropriations for that yard should not be omitted from this bill.

It is well known our ships of war are ordered off on long cruises in tropical seas and to sickly climates in various parts of the world. It is wise, sensible, and just when those ships return home to recruit their crews and for repairs that they should be ordered to our most healthy ports, where their exhausted and worn-out officers and men may recuperate their health and strength and the vessels be cleansed and purified; and for sanitary reasons I believe the Kittery navy-yard is the most valuable of all. The water never freezes there. Vessels can go there any season of the year, and, lying there during one winter with open hatches, all the foulness and disease which they always bring home after long voyages are certain to be eradicated.

The arguments which can be made in favor of the Kittery navy-yard, as an important sanitary position, are many and vastly more than can be made in favor of any other navy-yard in the country. Kittery is a well-populated town, with only a small village around the navy-yard. It is not near any great city where the inhabitants are afraid that a naval vessel coming from a sickly port will bring contagion with it. The inhabitants are farmers and ship mechanics. They know that their climate in a short time will soon eradicate all disease and pestilence from any vessel lying there, and they are not afraid of the vessel and not afraid to work upon it.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if this House would reflect upon the advantages in other ways of this navy-yard they would at once recognize that it would not be sensible, indeed that it would be wrong, to leave out of this appropriation bill some provision for construction and repair at the Kittery navy-yard. As I have already stated, it has great advantages over other navy-yards. It is a good yard, with good dry-docks, and they have there men skilled in the construction of vessels. Why, sir, in the State of Maine we have built more than one-half of the tonnage of shipping in this country. The Government wants a navy, and wants navy-yards where they can get proper men to run them. They want skilled mechanics, trained up to shipbuilding from father to son, and just such men are to be found in Kittery and that vicinity. And they are scarcely to be found in sufficient numbers this side of there.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I renew it. I do not desire to say anything special on this provision except to ask the gentleman who has the bill in charge to explain one thing, and it is this: Prior to the last Congress ten cents a mile was allowed for the necessary traveling expenses. At the last Congress it was supposed that was giving too much, and the appropriation bill was amended so as to allow only actual traveling expenses. I see the gentleman from Georgia in this provision prefers to get back to the mileage system again. The inquiry I make is this: Has the committee found that under the new system of paying the actual traveling expenses there has been abuse? I recognize there is a reduction to eight cents in lieu of ten cents a mile allowed before. But why is the mileage system preferable to the payment of actual traveling expenses?

Mr. BLOUNT. It has been found from the Fourth Auditor's Office that it costs more under the system of actual expenses than under the previous mileage system even at ten cents a mile. The committee, after consideration, came to the conclusion to reduce it to eight cents a mile.

Mr. DURHAM. I wish to know what was the reason operating upon the minds of the committee?

Mr. BLOUNT. The ascertainment of that fact was the reason operating with the committee, and I understand the same thing has been found to be true in the War Department.

Mr. O'NEILL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will continue, in reply to what has been said of ice obstruction in the river Delaware. I wish merely to bring to the attention of the House the fact that there is no ice obstruction below the Horseshoe Shoals, which lie just above the League Island naval station. Some three or four years ago, as my colleagues will recollect, an appropriation was made to survey the shoals and to report to the House the best manner of removing the difficulty of navigation at that place caused by ice gorges during an occasional hard winter. Such winters are not frequent. The city of Philadelphia generously provided for keeping up three ice-boats during the winters, and after the survey, which was inexpensive, there was no further appropriation asked for by the shipping merchants of Philadelphia and its commercial boards for improvement. Now there is no ice there which is an obstruction. The ice is above the League Island navy-yard. The ice-boats keep the channel clear.

But there is another thing I wish to state. My colleague who went so elaborately into the transactions of the city of Philadelphia in reference to this yard did not give the items of amounts paid for this island, which I wish now to submit. I hope the members of the committee will understand that this location of League Island was sought out by the Government and the proposition for its purchase brought before Congress in 1862 by the then Secretary of the Navy, who recommended it, and that it was not proposed or suggested by the city of Philadelphia. This cannot be too frequently stated or impressed upon members. We are not chargeable with merely a local interest in this matter. I hope I will be pardoned for saying it, in her generosity, being always generous where the Government is concerned, the city of Philadelphia bought this island, giving for it $398,658.92, but did not stop there. It appeared afterward there was a title to be obtained for some ground at the foot of Broad street. The city appropriated $25,620 more to buy this ground. Then the Government said it might want some fifty or sixty feet of the territory around the north bank, of what is called the back channel. Philadelphia then appropriated $65,000 and purchased that land. So that at the cost of within a few thousand dollars of a half million dollars, namely, $489,278.92, the city of Philadelphia gladly and willingly—for the Government needed it—gave this land to the United States to be used as a navy-yard for the construction of iron-clad vessels and their repair.

Mr. Chairman, you know very well the condition of the Delaware River to-day in reference to ship-building, especially iron-ship building. There have been at a period of time within the past few years thirty iron vessels building on the river at one time in the great ship-yards of John Roach & Son, William Cramp & Son, Wood & Dialogue, and at the yards of other ship-builders along the river. There have been among these some of nearly five thousand tons, and the waters of the Delaware are now looked upon as the best location for these ship-yards, being fresh and preservative of iron.

Another fact comes to mind which I will state for the benefit of the gentleman from New York. I want to show how well adapted the Delaware is for a great naval station in every respect. Within the last few months—I wish I could give the date and the name of the ship, an immense merchantman, and I refer to it in order to show that a vessel drawing any depth of water can come up the river with but little delay—a vessel came to the wharves of Philadelphia from New York to unload, her tonnage being so great that she could not afford to await the tides at Sandy Hook.

I will also state that several years ago the ship Great Republic could not enter the port of New York, but came to Philadelphia to discharge her cargo. And even as regards the Great Eastern, the largest steamer ever built in point of tonnage, men were willing to bring her to our wharves, but there was some doubt or hesitancy because the policies of insurance might have been called in question.

But I had really believed the League Island navy-yard had been a fixed fact these six years, to say nothing of the struggles and discussions and legislation upon the subject during earlier Congresses. I regret the present issue and the necessity of this debate. The occasion should not have occurred, for there was no adequate reason for it. Why the Naval Committee should propose to abolish this navy-yard after appropriations amounting in the aggregate to more than a million and a quarter of dollars I cannot comprehend.

There is everything to commend League Island: fresh water, plenty of land, cheapness of labor. Abounding in skilled labor, Philadelphia is almost the workshop of this country. Go into the district of Judge KELLEY, or the third district, represented by Mr. RANDALL, or the first district, represented by Mr. FREEMAN, or the fifth district, represented by Mr. ROBBINS, or into the district represented by me, and you will find in each of them thousands of skilled mechanics and skilled laborers. The supply is inexhaustible and the workmanship unsurpassed in this or any other country. Nowhere can Government work or private work be better done and nowhere can be found a steadier or happier body of men than those in Philadelphia engaged in mechanical operations and in labor necessary thereto.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

It is due to the Committee on Appropriations, or rather to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, to say something in reference to why they recommend that Kittery should not have a civil establishment. I would like the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] who spoke on behalf of Kittery, to listen. We find that almost the whole argument that was made on behalf of Kittery was that it was a good station to which in case of sickness on board of vessels they could be run in. But an examination showed that in case of danger or any contest with a foreign nation it was entirely exposed to the enemy. As a member of the committee, I might have gone a little further and taxed my memory, for I have never heard a more complete condemnation of Kittery navy-yard than from the gentleman who now asks to have it continued. Running back all through the congressional history of the gentleman from Maine and the remarks he has made in reference to that yard, I find a complete condemnation of the Kittery yard.

Mr. HALE. To which gentleman from Maine do you refer?

Mr. RANDALL. I refer not to you, but to your colleague, Mr. BURLEIGH. Not only have we that gentleman's speeches, but we have his exhibits. I find several of them here that I may, if necessary, incorporate in my remarks as affording reasons palpable and plain why that navy-yard and the administration of everything connected with it should be suspended, (that is all we ask,) if not rooted out. There is a mistake in the minds of members about what the Committee on Appropriations have asked here. We do not venture to say that any navy-yard should be abolished except New London, which we shall probably protect by amendments; but we thought for the coming year that with a due regard to economy, and without any injury to the public service, we could make appropriations to some of these yards. And being aware of the condemnation pronounced heretofore by the gentleman from Maine as to the management of the Kittery yard, we cut it off from any appropriation; but we do not propose to close it up; we do not offer to sell it.

But we said this, and we said it in relation to all yards that were in the same category with that at Kittery, that the Secretary of the Navy should cause an examination to be had, and that he should report at the next session of Congress whether any of these yards could be disposed of.

Now, I do not want that the Committee on Appropriations shall be condemned for what they have not done. I believe that the true way to settle the question is to limit the appropriations as we have suggested, and then submit the question of the abolition of certain navy-yards to the Secretary of the Navy, or to what would be better, a board of naval officers, who shall report at the next session of Congress; then we shall know from a skillful board, a board who will consult engineers and scientific men, whether any of these yards should be abolished.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The gentleman who last spoke says that he never heard anything in favor of the Kittery navy-yard except that it was a good place for sanitary reasons, and he spoke of my record wherein I have condemned that yard for the reason that there was fraud in that yard. I so believed and so stated to the House. This year we have had an examination of that yard and have found fraud and corruption there, and the statements I made have been more than substantiated. We have also been to Philadelphia and visited the navy-yard there, and the frauds in Kittery no more compare with those in Philadelphia than a little boy with a hatchet does with Captain Kidd.

When you come to refer to my record as to the Kittery navy-yard you do not quote my record as to the facilities at the Kittery navy-yard. The river on which it lies is within two hours' reach of as many facilities for the manufacture of iron and building ships as there are in Philadelphia, and we buy our coal and iron in Philadelphia, and then it comes to New Market, Lowell, Concord, and Portland, and they build iron ships and steam-engines and boilers, and compete with Pennsylvania in markets south of them; and in speaking of the Kittery navy-yard and its facilities, I mean to say that it is not surpassed by any navy-yard in the country so far as the surrounding facilities, not one.

Mr. O'NEILL. Just one word. The people of Kittery ought to be under great obligations to the citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, and the gentleman representing them ought not to be here demanding the abolition of the navy-yard at League Island. Long before the gentleman was born (perhaps I am going too far back) the citizens of the State of Pennsylvania had invested and sunk in iron and coal lands millions upon millions of dollars to give to the people of Kittery and others the facilities of getting iron and coal whereby the material could be supplied to them for the employment of skilled mechanics in the various mechanical occupations. Thus Pennsylvania has done something for the benefit of the skilled mechanics of Kittery and those who employ them.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offered an amendment, but withdrew it for the convenience of other gentlemen. I move to amend the text of the bill by striking out, in line 14, "$5,750,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000,000." I do not want to take up the time of the committee.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BLOUNT's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in immediately after the word "hundred," in lines 16 and 17.

The Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to make a proposition to the committee which I think will be sustained. I understand that the bill now being read is to be offered as an amendment to this bill. I have never seen it and I do not know what is in it. I should be glad to have an opportunity to study it to see whether it is liable to a point of order, and I think that members should have an opportunity to look at the various propositions reported by the Naval Committee. They have given great study to them, and they are all of great importance. I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Tennessee has another amendment which he desires to offer, and I ask that all these amendments be printed in the RECORD; and I desire also to offer an amendment to the navy-yard portion of the bill; I offer it on my own account and not from the Committee on Appropriations. I ask that it also be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The amendments offered are as follows:

All officers of the volunteer service of the Navy shall be discharged from service after the 1st of July, 1876; and laws authorizing the appointment or employment by the Secretary of the Navy of any person in the volunteer Navy shall be, and are hereby, repealed: Provided, That all civil engineers now in the naval service shall be discharged on the 1st day of July, 1876.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE, in relation to the Marine Corps:

That the Marine Corps of the United States shall consist of one commandant with the rank of colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, seventeen captains, twenty-two first lieutenants, twenty-two second lieutenants, one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one hundred and forty sergeants, one hundred and thirty-five corporals, and twelve hundred privates in time of peace, to be increased in time of war, at the discretion of the President, to any number not exceeding three thousand, with a corresponding increase of non-commissioned officers: Provided, That the commissions of officers now in the corps shall not be vacated by this act; but these officers holding staff appointments shall be retransferred to the line of the corps according to the date of commission, and no promotions or appointments to fill vacancies in the list of commissioned officers shall be made until the number of such officers shall have been reduced by casualties or otherwise to the number above provided in this section: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall preclude the advancement of any officer to a higher grade for distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession as is authorized by sections 1605 and 1607 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That in case any reduction is made by the present or any succeeding Congress in the pay of the officers of the Army, a corresponding reduction shall take place in the pay of the officers of the Marine Corps.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE, in relation to navy-yards:

On page 3 strike out all from the beginning of line 43 to the word "commencement" inclusive in line 51 and insert the following:

That the navy-yards at Brooklyn, Kittery, Charlestown, and Norfolk be retained for general purposes; and those at Pensacola and Mare Island be retained as naval rendezvouses, and for temporary repairs; and the yard at Washington be used only for manufacturing purposes under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy; and the yards at League Island and New London be abandoned, and the property thereto appertaining, where the same cannot be utilized or removed without too great expense, be sold, and the proceeds turned into the Treasury; and for the civil establishment at the foregoing yards, —— thousand dollars.

By Mr. RANDALL:

For the civil establishments of the several navy-yards, $85,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to organize a naval board of five commissioned officers in the Navy as soon as practicable, whose duty it shall be to examine fully and determine whether, in their opinion, any of the navy-yards can be dispensed with and abandoned, and, if so, to report the best manner of making disposition of the same, and further to inquire as to the propriety of establishing a naval rendezvous at Tybee Island or at Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia, and whether any Government property at said islands can be made available and are suitable for such purpose; and said board shall, through the Secretary of the Navy, report to Congress at the commencement of the next session the result of their inquiry; and the sum of $2,000 is herewith appropriated to meet the expenses incurred by said board.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest that instead of rising, as nearly the whole of the day has been taken from the Committee on Appropriations, we leave that portion of the bill to which these amendments apply and proceed with the consideration of the bill for half an hour longer.

Mr. BANKS. I hope not. I am just as ignorant of the latter portion of the bill as I am of the first part of it or of these amendments. And this is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. RANDALL. The real motive for the committee rising at this time is to enable certain gentlemen here to go and see the torpedo experiment. We may as well state the real reason for the committee rising. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. BANKS was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3514) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,'" approved July 1, 1862, and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned; which was read a first and second time, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. RANDALL. Some time since the House adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Rules to examine in relation to a conspiracy alleged to have been entered into by the Clerk and other officers of this House to affect the action of the House upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. There was appointed to-day a special committee to investigate certain charges against the Clerk. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report back to the House the resolution which was referred to them and to move that it be referred to the special committee.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. McDILL, by unanimous consent, presented a copy of the opinion of the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the State of Iowa in the case of The United States ex rel. Hall et al. vs. The Union Pacific Railroad, upon the subject of the tolls charged by that road; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HOSKINS was excused from service upon the special committee appointed to investigate United States officials, &c., in Louisiana.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers and petition in the case of E. H. Holmes, sergeant Company E, Sixth Maryland Volunteers.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER was granted leave of absence for one week from Monday next.

Mr. EVANS was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of a death in his family.

Mr. HOLMAN was granted leave of absence for six days on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. HOAR was granted leave of absence for ten days from Monday next.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CANDLER: The petition of John A. Richardson, executor of Benjamin O. Jones, of Georgia, for compensation for the use, occupation, and damage to property by the United States troops, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FAULKNER: The petition of 231 citizens of Wheeling, West Virginia, that Congress extend the national credit to the completion of a great southern line of railroad to the Pacific, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Also, the petition of citizens of New Cumberland, West Virginia, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: Petitions for the acknowledgment of God and Christianity in the Constitution of the United States, signed by 7,365 persons from the States of Ohio and West Virginia, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OLIVER: The petition of 130 citizens of Everett County, Iowa, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2645) to quiet the title of settlers on the so-called Des Moines River lands, Iowa, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of 200 citizens of Clay County, Iowa, that the law be so amended as to allow the McGregor and Missouri River Railroad to form its junction with the Sioux City and Saint Paul Railroad at or near the forty-third parallel, north latitude, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. JOHN REILLY: The petition of William Quentin, late a corporal Company A, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RIDDLE: A paper relating to the petition of A. M. Tinsley, for a pension, to the same committee.

By Mr. WIGGINTON: Memorial of the San Francisco Microscopical Society, that steps be taken looking to the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures, to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 22, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. EATON presented the credentials of William H. Barnum, elected by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Orris S. Ferry.

The credentials were read; and, the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. BARNUM, he took his seat in the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of March 27, a report from the Secretary of State relating to the amount of money in the custody of the Department of State to the credit of the awards of the mixed commission under the treaty between the United States and Venezuela of April, 1866; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers suggesting that the attention of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate be invited to the importance of an increase of the appropriation of $125,000 as passed by the House of Representatives to $155,000 for the construction of a new snag-boat for use on the western rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am requested to present the petition of A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, an officer of the Senate, praying for an investigation into the manner in which his duties have been performed. He respectfully represents that the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives was by a resolution of the House called upon to examine into the management of the Government Printing Office; that he gave them all the assistance in his power; that they received from him his books and papers and all the aid that it was possible for him to give them. The petitioner complains that injustice has been done to him as an officer of the Senate; that his books have been and are still detained from him; that no opportunity was given to him by the committee of the House for explanation; that he was denied the ordinary privileges of a person accused, and was called upon without sufficient time or opportunity to defend himself against charges without specification or notice. The nature of the complaint, it seems to me, presents a question of privilege; and, therefore, I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to inquire into the truth of the allegations contained in the paper.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to my friend from Ohio that the petition be referred to the Committee on Printing. It is a matter peculiarly within their province, and it occurs to me that it ought to go to that committee. The Committee on Privileges and Elections has quite enough business now to attend to, and therefore I make the suggestion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Committee on Printing is the proper committee. It seems to me the petition ought to be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or to a special committee; but I think it should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Committee on Printing is composed of but three members. The chairman of that committee is absent sick, and I am told by the clerk of the committee that although he may be here soon, he probably will not be in a condition to examine into the matter at an early period. I think, therefore, the petition ought to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. After the Committee on Privileges and Elections examine into the truth of the complaint, and see the extent and nature of the charge, they can report the case back for such further examination as they deem proper; but in the first instance, as the petition comes from an officer of the Senate, plainly made so by statute law, complaining of injustice done to him by another, a highly important and influential branch of the Government, it seems to me it ought first to be considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections before we proceed any further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reference of the petition to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? The Chair hears none, and it is so referred.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I present a petition signed by a large number of citizens of Philadelphia who pray that the word "religious" may be restored to the tariff act where it applies to stained glass. It seems that for a number of years stained glass, among other things, was allowed to be imported by different societies when used entirely for their own purposes; but in the printing of the last series of the laws the word "religious" was omitted, so that churches and other religious societies are now prevented from importing stained glass without paying duties, while all other societies are allowed to import it as formerly. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of Susan Lawson, praying to have paid to her as the only heir of Simeon Randall, deceased, all sums of money due to him for services rendered in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Charles W. Fisher, of Jefferson County, New York, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of masters and vessel-owners of Saint Lawrence County, New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2479) granting an American register to the Canadian steam ferry-boat Geneva, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of John W. Johnson, praying to be allowed a pension. I wish to state that I present this petition by request. I know nothing of the merits or demerits of the case, and therefore am not committed for or against it. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1460) granting a pension to Lydia A. Morris, widow of the late John K. Morris, Company A, Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2292) granting a pension to Thomas Shannon, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 709, for the relief of Hans C. Peterson.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope no bill will be taken up now, as we shall have but a few moments for executive session before the time fixed for the meeting of the court.

Mr. McMILLAN. This is a bill to which I presume there will be no objection. It has received full examination from the Committee on Claims, and a report has been made which I think will satisfy the members of the Senate. In view of the fact that the committee to investigate into election affairs in Mississippi will have to leave this city very soon, I, being a member of that committee, desire to have the bill disposed of. I perhaps shall not have another opportunity to call it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator probably to-day at a later period can ask the Senate to act upon his bill. I think it important to have an executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will my friend withhold his motion until I make a report or two from a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa must see that we have but a few moments of time for executive business. Can he not withhold his reports until to-morrow?

Mr. WRIGHT. I shall not insist upon my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour fixed having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate is suspended, and pursuant to order the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 469) for the relief of the legal representatives of Joseph L. Locke, deceased, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of the 14th of February last to inquire into the expediency of establishing a penitentiary upon the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Arkansas, for the confinement of United States prisoners, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that an order be made that the petition and papers in the case of Madeira & Cabado, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims. I make this motion at the request of the persons interested in the claim. If there has been an adverse report, of course the Clerk will not send the papers to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will conform to the rule. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That Frank Page have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

HANS C. PETERSON.

Mr. McMILLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 709.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of Hans C. Peterson was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and settle the claim of Hans C. Peterson for damages sustained by him by reason of depredations and injuries by certain bands of Sioux Indians, in Minnesota, in the year 1862, and to pay him $2,283.92 in full payment and satisfaction for all losses and damages by him sustained.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is not in his place, because I wish to move to take up, so as to leave it as the unfinished business, House bill No. 2572 to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases, which has been brought to my attention again by what was said this morning about witnesses, &c. The bill was put over once on the application of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] because he was not ready to speak upon it. I have no doubt he is ready by this time, and, of course not with the expectation of action to-day but to get it on the tapis for further consideration and disposal, I move to take up this House bill, which will not, when it is taken up, occupy more than an hour or two I think, at the most, in order that we may get a vote upon it and have it out of the way.

It may be said that possibly its present attitude is placing a kind of embargo or embarrassment on the investigations of the House of Representatives. They may be waiting in the expectation that we shall pass this bill. I think, therefore, it is due to the public interests that the Senate should decide upon the question. I move to take it up in order that it may be the unfinished business when we get to legislative business again.

Mr MORRILL, of Vermont. I hardly think it would be right to take up the bill indicated by my colleague in so thin a Senate. I know if the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN,] were present, he would object, he being very anxious to take up what is called the silver bill. While I have not any particular affection for the silver bill, I think it is due to the Senator from Ohio that no action should be taken that would be considered hostile to the purpose which he has heretofore indicated to take up that bill immediately after we get through with the business which has been pressing upon the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will say, then, that if the Senator from Ohio and the Committee on Finance insist when we get into a state of doing something again that the silver bill should have precedence of this matter, (which is really a kind of a question of privilege,) I shall not insist upon its standing in the way; but I very thoroughly believe that the Senator from Ohio and all the gentlemen of the Finance Committee will be quite willing to have this matter disposed of, inasmuch as owing to its peculiar character our non-action may be thought by the House of Representatives as still leaving the matter on the tapis and not giving them an opportunity to guide their operations as they otherwise would. If the Senator from Ohio, in this view of the case, insists upon going on with the silver bill, I shall not antagonize it by this measure. I am quite sure, however, that he will assent to have the bill in regard to witnesses disposed of, and so I make the motion to take it up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senate will remember that the bill now pending in the order of business is the Japanese indemnity bill, which has been discussed for two or three days. I hope the Senators who are in favor of that bill will stand by it until it is disposed of.

Mr. ALLISON. It will not take much longer to finish it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It will not take long to dispose of it. I hope my friend from Vermont will not antagonize this bill.

In reference to the particular bill suggested by the Senator from Vermont, my judgment does not accord with his as to the importance of the Senate acting upon it. There is an adverse report to the bill, and I think the Senator from Vermont joined with those who reported adversely. If those who reported an amendment to it or put in a minority report do not move the matter, I do not see why those who are adverse to it should move it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from New Jersey will allow me a moment, I will state that I know two Senators who sit on this side of the Chamber and are now absent from it who are anxious that the bill indicated by the Senator from Vermont should be taken up. I have heard them so express themselves. Therefore I hope that the motion of the Senator from Vermont will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the unfinished business is the Japanese indemnity bill, as shown by the record.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And I hope no business will be taken up to put the bill out of its place. Let us have a vote upon it. It has been pending here for some time, and there have been six different reports upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 626) in relation to the Japanese indemnity fund is before the Senate as the unfinished business, pending which the Senator from Vermont moves to take up the bill to protect witnesses who shall be required to testify in certain cases.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn takes precedence.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is understood that we are to have an executive session.

Mr. PADDOCK. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that this bill, with the accompanying veto message and other papers, be referred to the Judiciary Committee. The bill came from that committee, and I presume should go back to it.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. This being a private claim, I think it ought to go to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have no objection; but the bill as I understand was reported from the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. It should have been referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have no objection to that reference.

There being no objection, the bill, with the accompanying message and other papers, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform this House whether he has any official or other information in respect to the matters before stated; whether any steps have been taken by the Executive for the protection of any American citizen resident in said dominions; and that the President be requested to take such measures as shall be within his power to extend and secure such protection to all American citizens so resident therein.

Joint resolution in relation to the Texas and Pacific Railroad.

Whereas of the several measures now pending in Congress providing for the guarantee by the Government of the United States of the interest on the construction bonds of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, the measure recently approved by a numerously attended convention, held at Saint Louis, Missouri, composed of delegates representing the best intelligence and character of every section of the Southern States, which provides adequate connection between the State of Texas and the Pacific Ocean, and provides connecting lines with the Mississippi Valley, at New Orleans, Vicksburgh, Memphis, and Saint Louis, fully meets the demands of the South and Southwest for communication with the Pacific coast, and of the whole country for a competing line which will insure material reduction in the present cost of transcontinental transportation; and whereas this measure provides an open national highway between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, not affected by the influence of climate and the seasons to an extent at any time likely to interrupt transportation; and also provides a postal and military line of inestimable value to the Federal Government, promoting an economy of administration in the postal and military department which will annually save to the Federal Treasury an amount more than equal to the amount of the guarantee that is asked: Therefore,

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no further bills and joint resolutions for reference, the next business in the morning hour is the second call of States for resolutions, during which call bills and joint resolutions may be introduced. The Chair will direct the unfinished business upon the Calendar, being resolutions that have been laid over on account of debate arising thereon, to be taken up under this call, and the Clerk will now read the next resolution upon the Calendar.

CHOICE OF PRESIDENT.

The Clerk read the following preamble and resolution introduced by Mr. PAGE:

Whereas the Constitution of the United States, as framed by the fathers of the Republic, imposes no limit upon the eligibility of any citizen to the office of President further than that he shall be native-born and of a certain age and time of residence: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the judgment of this House the right of selecting candidates for the office of President can only be lawfully exercised by the people under existing constitutional restrictions, and has never been delegated by the people to the House of Representatives or to any members of the same, and that any attempt by the House of Representatives to limit or forestall the public will on a question of such importance is an invasion of powers reserved to the people at large, to be freely exercised by them without any interference from any legislative body whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the preamble and resolution just read.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask that the resolution be again read, so that we may understand exactly what it is.

Mr. FRYE. It is a perfectly safe resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is it in order to discuss this resolution at this time? If so, I would like to ask the gentleman who introduced it to explain what it is.

Mr. ATKINS. Is there any attempt to infringe upon that power of the people?

Mr. KASSON. What member of the House of Representatives is doing the thing that is censured by this resolution? What is the point of the resolution?

Mr. PAGE. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAGE. I will state that I introduced this resolution on the 17th of December last. It was intended by me to offset a resolution which had been offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] limiting the power of the people of this country in their selection of a candidate for President of the United States. I offered this resolution in order to test the sense of the House at that time.

Mr. EDEN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is in order.

Mr. PAGE. There is nothing in the resolution but what I think every member of this House can heartily indorse. I must say that I never supposed it would come up again; but as it has come up I call the previous question upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask the gentleman if he did not intend this resolution to be an intimation in favor of the third term?

Mr. PAGE. I intended just what the resolution purports; that the people of this country would take that matter in charge themselves, when the time came; and they did not want any instructions from that side of the House as to whom they should select for President, or from this side of the House either.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the people be safe in case we pass this resolution? [Laughter.]

Mr. PAGE. I believe they will, especially the democracy of Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. BLOUNT moved to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 147, nays 82, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Bliss, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Mr. JENKS. My colleague, Mr. COCHRANE, is absent by leave of the House. I cannot say how he would vote if present.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleagues, Mr. EVANS and Mr. ROBINSON, are absent by leave of the House. If present, I think they would both vote "no."

Mr. HENDEE. My colleague, Colonel JOYCE, is absent at New York in the service of the House.

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague from Ohio, Mr. VANCE, is absent under the order of the House. I agreed to pair with him on certain questions. Were he here I would vote "no," and he probably would vote "ay."

Mr. BRADLEY. My colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, is absent by permission of the House.

Mr. FORT. My colleagues, Mr. WHITING and Mr. HURLBUT, are both absent by leave of the House.

Mr. MAGOON. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. KIMBALL, who is absent from the House, would if present vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK—EMMA MINE.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to authorize the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report on Thursday the 25th instant, immediately after the reading of the Journal or any time thereafter, in reference to the connection of Robert C. Schenck with the Emma Silver Mine Company (limited) of London.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield the floor. I understand that I have been recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] rises to a question of privilege, and the Chair is bound to give him the floor.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I ask to have read from the proceedings of Saturday last an extract from the speech by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. I renew it.

It is due to the Committee on Appropriations, or rather to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, to say something in reference to why they recommend that Kittery should not have a civil establishment. I would like the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] who spoke on behalf of Kittery, to listen. We find that almost the whole argument that was made on behalf of Kittery was that it was a good station to which in case of sickness on board of vessels they could be run in. But an examination showed that in case of danger or any contest with a foreign nation it was entirely exposed to the enemy. As a member of the committee, I might have gone a little further and taxed my memory, for I have never heard a more complete condemnation of Kittery navy-yard than from the gentleman who now asks to have it continued. Running back all through the congressional history of the gentleman from Maine and the remarks he has made in reference to that yard, I find a complete condemnation of the Kittery yard.

Mr. HALE. To which gentleman from Maine do you refer?

Mr. RANDALL. I refer not to you, but to your colleague, Mr. BURLEIGH. Not only have we that gentleman's speeches, but we have his exhibits. I find several of them here that I may, if necessary, incorporate in my remarks as affording reasons palpable and plain why that navy-yard and the administration of everything connected with it should be suspended, (that is all we ask,) if not rooted out. There is a mistake in the minds of members about what the Committee on Appropriations have asked here. We do not venture to say that any navy-yard should be abolished except New London, which we shall probably protect by amendments; but we thought for the coming year that, with a due regard for economy and without any injury to the public service, we could make appropriations to some of these yards. And being aware of the condemnation pronounced heretofore by the gentleman from Maine as to the management of the Kittery yard, we cut it off from any appropriation; but we do not propose to close it up; we do not offer to sell it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know whether this is a question of privilege.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] will be allowed to proceed irrespective of that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot rule on the point till he hears the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BLOUNT. As this matter appears to grow out of the debate on Saturday last upon navy-yards, I suggest that, if we go into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill, that subject will be soon reached. I make this suggestion to the gentleman, if it be agreeable to him.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I do not propose to yield the floor. I am entitled to it, as I understand.

Mr. BLOUNT. I simply made a suggestion. I do not propose to interrupt the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When a gentleman states that a matter involves his official character as a member of the House, he has a right to the floor upon a question of privilege.

Mr. BURLEIGH. This arraignment of me by the honorable gentleman has this foundation, that I being a member of the Forty-third Congress had occasion in the conscientious discharge of my duty to utter on this floor the language which I ask the Clerk to read from the RECORD of December 22, 1874, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making some remarks on this bill. It will be noticed that the portion of this bill relating to the Bureau of Construction and Repair is included in twelve lines. Last year that portion of the bill embraced one hundred lines. Has the Navy Department become so much more honest that we can trust it further than heretofore? I maintain that the abbreviation of that portion of the bill is in the interest of contractors. We to-day have a Secretary of the Navy; good, honest, intelligent officers in the Navy; constructors and skilled mechanics to lay out thework in the navy-yards and oversee it; skilled laborers, ready to work, men that have learned their trade in the navy-yards, and of superior skill—a perfect organization. But as an appendage, for a tail I may say, we have the contractors. The trouble is that the contractors are winding around the whole body.

On this I have a little story to tell, and now is the right time to tell it. Last winter a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs received a letter from a contractor at the Kittery navy-yard, claiming that a constructor from another yard and the head of a Bureau had received many presents of different kinds from contractors; that he paid them $6,000 for their influence with the Navy Department to buy a timber-bending machine of him, now in Boston. The letter was withdrawn during the recess by request of the party sending it, and acknowledgment made that they were not right when the first letter was sent. The first contract by this Mr. Griffeths was to complete the new sloop of war building at Portsmouth. During the recess he receives an extra $4,000 for completing her and $2,000 for launching her—a ship of six hundred tons—with all the facilities of the yard at his command, and he says there was a mistake in his sending the letter; and now what is the result? The man had contracted to complete the ship. At first he gets four prices to launch her; he gets $4,000 to complete the ship again; and now he has a contract, as I understand it, under which they agree to give him $25,000 to go on with her, and he does not agree in that contract to complete the ship; he does not seem to be bound to do anything but have money.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to amend the clause just read by striking out "$100,000" and inserting "$50,000." I make this motion for the purpose of stating that I believe this contingent fund, or a portion of it, is used to thwart the action of Congress.

The records will show, and many men on this floor will remember, that at the last session of the Forty-second Congress an act was passed cutting off certain sinecure offices in the different navy-yards—that of receiver of and that of clerk of accounts.

My predecessor (Mr. Lynch) at that time on this floor asserted, as he had done before, that these were sinecure offices; that the receiver at the Kittery navy-yard in particular did nothing but receive his pay; that the Secretary of the Navy himself knew they were sinecure offices, and had discharged the incumbents, but was obliged to fill the position of receiver again at Kittery on account of the political pressure which was brought to bear on him. It was also stated by Mr. Lynch that he expected that at the other end of the Capitol there would be a pressure brought to bear to have these officers retained. He was not disappointed. They did not succeed, however, and the places were abolished.

The appropriation for these sinecure places expired in July, 1873; but a short time before the expiration of that appropriation I learned that the receiver to whom my predecessor stated it was robbery to pay money out of the Treasury of the United States for doing nothing was about again to be appointed to a similar position. I wrote to the Secretary of the Navy, referring him to the action of Congress and the statements which were then made, telling him that I believed them to be true, and protesting in the most respectful manner, but earnestly, against his appointing any man to such position in the district I have the honor to represent.

Mr. BURLEIGH. In this connection I ask to submit references to the reports of the investigations at Kittery and Boston sustaining the charges which I made.

First contract not performed shown in the Kittery report by testimony of Thomas E. Webb, pages 51, 52; T. D. Wilson, pages 67 and 71; P. Hichborn, page 79.

Second contract covers work that should have been done under the first contract. (Testimony of T. D. Wilson, page 75, and P. Hichborn, pages 85 and 87.)

See also in Boston report testimony of R. E. Jackson, page 48, and E. K. McMicheal, page 37.

No competition as required by law. (Page 69, T. D. Wilson.)

Bills carried over. (T. D. Wilson's testimony, page 73.)

On the 22d of December, 1874, I charged on this floor that there was a sinecure position in the Kittery navy-yard that neither my predecessor nor myself had been able to keep off. (See Commodore Fairfax's testimony, pages 98 and 99.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, because I dared, as a Representative of as confiding and as honest a constituency as any gentleman in this House may represent and as an honest, faithful member of the republican party, and devoted to the principles upon which it is organized, to express my objection to frauds and abuses existing in the public service, I am to be assailed and my people and the State I in part represent punished. Is it thus reform is to be met? Is it in this manner fidelity to the public service is to be rewarded?

The motives of the gentleman, as made apparent by the gentleman's own declarations, sustain me in the position that I have hitherto maintained, which position is that reformation in the public service is alone to be expected by the people from the republican party.

Since, as the gentleman declares in substance, honest rebuke to corrupt practices and plunderers is to be followed by punishment to him who either has the courage or honesty to administer it, I invite this House to make or cause to be made the most searching investigations into the truth or falsity of the charges I made here in the Forty-third Congress. I, in my own person, am willing to stand or fall by the result of such an investigation.

But I pray you, Mr. Speaker, if these charges that I have made be true, do not put this House in the category in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has placed himself, of punishing the people of two States because one of their Representatives has conceived it to be his duty in reference to his sworn obligation to make them.

The abuses to which I called attention do not attach to the yard at Kittery, but to its management by officials and contractors who do not reside there. The yard should not be punished.

Abuses, I have little doubt, exist at other places, and if the gentleman adheres to the policy of abolishing all navy-yards at which they may be found to exist he will find that he can very considerably reduce his appropriation bill.

Mr. Speaker, in those remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] it is distinctly asserted and charged that, in consequence of certain speeches, remarks, and exhibits made by me during my congressional history, the appropriation for the Kittery navy-yard for the coming fiscal year is not made.

Mr. Speaker, this is no light matter; for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to say to a member of this House and to the world that in consequence of the member's conduct the usual annual appropriation for a navy-yard in his district is cut off is to my mind a very serious matter, involving serious consequence to the good name of the member.

The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations said that "it is due to the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee to say something in reference to why they recommend that Kittery should not have a civil establishment," and then goes on to state that it is in consequence of information that I rendered.

Does the gentleman not notice that by this arrangement he gets League Island retained as a full navy-yard, a place no more now like one than any mud-bank in a river or swamp a mile from solid land, a place where, according to the evidence of one of the most experienced constructors in the Navy, given to the Naval Committee, it will cost $1,000,000 to get ready to build the first ship and $50,000,000 to make a navy-yard of it, a place where, as the captain of the steamboat that took the committee down said, they could beat the world in raising musquitoes? The commandant of the yard came to us as we were taking evidence there about four o'clock and said that we had better leave there soon unless we wanted to get the fever and ague. One gentleman employed there, as he testified, said that his head felt as though it would burst; he had the League Island fever. One thing is sure, the Kittery yard is on land, good solid land, with ship-houses, dry-dock, machine-shops, store-houses, and other numerous buildings and dwellings for a complete yard, as it is, in good order and condition. Iron-clads were built there during the war. Some of the best ships we have were built there, and to-day everything is complete to build such vessels, and to build engines and boilers for our largest ships of war. The books of the Navy Department here will show that repairing and building have been done on this yard since its existence cheaper, and I will add better, than in any other yard in the country. It is well defended by forts from two to three miles outside of it and has high land to seaward of it where earth-works would make the yard more invulnerable than any yard I know of.

Mr. Speaker, I was elected to the Forty-third Congress on the platform of my party as enunciated at Philadelphia in 1872. Retrenchment and reform within the party and by the party were not meaningless words to me then, nor are they now. On this platform I have stood and based all my actions, speeches, and votes to the best of my ability. My constituents, who are honest men, believe in it. I believe in it; and it is no cross for me to do my duty. It is perhaps easier for some to be what they call politic, and when in Rome do as Romans do. But I did not come here to be remolded; I came here thinking that the people, through their Representatives in Congress, had a right to an intelligent and healthy supervision over the affairs in this nation; and whether I am stating new ideas or not to some on this floor, I shall keep on thinking, speaking, voting against, and denouncing frauds and unlawful acts, whoever may be hit.

In regard to the American Navy, there is not a man on this floor, there is not a man in the country that I will acknowledge myself second to in zeal for its welfare.

For sixteen years I sailed under the Stars and Stripes. And no man here, perhaps, so well as I, can appreciate the feelings of an American sailor, after being five or six months at sea, on going into a port on the other side of the globe to find there an American man-of-war with the old flag at the peak. It is the next thing to getting home. Mr. Speaker, could I have my wish we would have a Navy that we all might be proud of; and in all my efforts in this House and elsewhere my wishes have been for its good.

Mr. Speaker, I deny the charges the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made against me in connection with the Kittery navy-yard as a yard, that I advocate a yard that is not well defended, or that I advocate one that has not superior advantages besides being the best for sanitary purposes. If he had examined my speeches and exhibits he would have learned that in no place nor at any time have I charged wrong on any officer of that yard. My charge was, as is shown by the RECORD, that wrongs were done there by order of officers superior to those who were stationed there. Could not and have not these same officials perpetrated the same wrongs at any of the other yards? Then why condemn the Kittery yard for wrongs of the same or similar character as those perpetrated on all the other yards, as you will find is the case from the investigating committee's report? Are you to close all the navy-yards?

Mr. Speaker, I stand here in a peculiar position. I, a republican, am arraigned by a democrat, the chairman of the Appropriation Committee, whose reputation for purity, integrity, and honor is national, a man elected by his constituents to battle with and vanquish corrupt republicans, and who has evinced such a disposition to do it.

I am arraigned before this democratic House because I have been zealous for an honest administration of the laws, and for attempting to check violations of law and frauds in and within my own party.

For these great crimes against my country and my constituents the appropriation for the navy-yard in my district is to be stopped, and my poor constituents to lose the benefits of the small amounts of money they now receive from the navy-yard.

What an encouragement to members in the future to attend to the duties their honest constituents expect of them? I cannot help feeling, Mr. Speaker, that the chairman of the committee, when making up this appropriation bill, did not perhaps have the punishment of the Kittery navy-yard so much in view as he did the audacity of your humble servant for standing up in his place in this House and exposing frauds.

I want to say a word more, and it is this: That though my efforts in behalf of honesty and economy in the public service may not be crowned with success, I am so constituted that I shall continue to work in the same direction. I am sorry that my field is not larger. If I had been a Representative on this floor for the last twelve or fourteen years from the great city of Philadelphia, had learned the ropes, and had listened to rumors that were in the air so thick that they might almost be felt, I might possibly have had the assurance to say something on this floor that would tend to put a stop to the Cattells levying a tax on purchases made by the Government, and have saved to it the half million dollars that they have collected; or I might have had something to say about the printing of the greenback paper, or the Printing and Engraving Bureau, or of sinecure positions. I believe that there is a great field there, including the old navy-yard and League Island; but I can only envy the position of the gentlemen who represent that distinguished city.

I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I ask may be read and adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Naval Committee are hereby charged with the duty of examining the charges in the RECORD made by Hon. JOHN H. BURLEIGH against the conduct at the Kittery navy-yard, and to report to this House as to the truth or falsity of the same as appears by the recent investigation; also whether any reasons have existed or do exist, caused by the conduct of those in special charge of the yard, for cutting off the appropriation for working it.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the adoption of that resolution. In so far as the gentleman has attempted to reflect upon me in connection with appropriations for the naval service, I leave my works to judge. This very bill in the aggregate sum, outside of the pay of the Navy, reduces the appropriations for the Navy from $11,000,000 to a little over $6,000,000. The gentleman is entirely welcome to his statement in reference to what I said the other day, although I feel inclined to make use of the old adage that—

> Commentators have in Homer sought
> More than Homer ever thought.

The resolution was adopted.

DOORKEEPER OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House from the Committee on Rules, which was instructed to inquire into the official conduct of the Doorkeeper of this House, the following report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the following resolutions:

"In view of the foregoing letter, written by L. H. Fitzhugh, which has just been read to this House, without any reference to other charges made against him, of the truth of which the House is not informed,

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that L. H. Fitzhugh is not a proper person to hold the honorable and responsible position of Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the United States, and that the said Fitzhugh, as Doorkeeper, be, and he is hereby, dismissed from office.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Rules inquire, and report without delay, whether any substantial reason exists why the offices of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of this House should not be consolidated in the Sergeant-at-Arms, as in the Senate"— report that the resolution above quoted would seem to limit and confine the investigation into the fitness or unfitness of the Doorkeeper for his position, as disclosed by the letter to Mr. Maddox, dated December 15, 1875. But as the "whole subject" was referred to the committee, their inquiry is enlarged by the newspaper extracts, indictments, and records in certain criminal proceedings, and the charge of blackmailing made in a deposition of Ex-Marshal Purnell, of the western district of Texas, and the various prejudicial statements in the letter to the Louisville Courier-Journal of April 29, 1876, going to the general character of the Doorkeeper, under the signature of W. G. Welch. These matters are printed in the RECORD of May 14, 1876, and consist of a mass of statements, to which the committee have given their attention.

It seemed to be the purpose of the House in referring this matter to this committee that the officer should be fully heard before any decisive action was had. The committee has left to the unrestricted judgment of the Doorkeeper to produce before them any and all statements, oral and written, by himself or others, in explanation of these multifarious charges. They have heard in the most informal way, by letter, affidavits, records, &c., all that is even remotely pertinent to the subject referred to them. They append hereto a full statement of the Doorkeeper himself.

1. As to the charge of attempted black-mailing, they have given it no credence. The charge is made by one who is not above reproach, and it is refuted in so far as it can be by the statement of Governor Davis and others. It has weighed nothing in this conclusion of the committee.

The committee are satisfied to take the statement of Mr. Peyton addressed to members of the Texas delegation as a sufficient refutation. Governor Davis, who is an opponent of the Doorkeeper in politics, testifies to his irreproachable character since he has lived in Texas.

2. As to the indictments for arson, larceny, and perjury, the committee heard the statement of Judge DURHAM, of Kentucky, who had been the attorney of Colonel Fitzhugh in these several cases; and, if the records were not sufficient to estop the committee from inquiry into the charges, the statement of Judge DURHAM is conclusive, namely: that, if he had been on the jury, he would have been bound to acquit upon the testimony.

Aside from the proposition that Congress may inquire into the previous conduct of one of its officers in order to pass upon his qualifications; aside from the proposition, which the committee adopt as correct, of regarding the recorded acquittal as conclusive of his innocence, nothing appears to the committee to justify them in opening or challenging the justice of the verdicts in those cases. It would be hard indeed, even in case of conviction, to hold a man thereafter morally incapable of trust; but in case of acquittal, like the present, it would be an undeserved and uncalled-for stigma upon the sanctity and conclusiveness of judicial procedure which the House would not justify. Nor does it matter whether the court after hearing the evidence for the prosecution directed the jury at once to acquit, or whether the jury, without instruction from the court, acquitted; the committee, following the intimation of the resolution referred to them, propose no excursion into such a field of inquiry. They propose only to consider the letter to Mr. Maddox, and "without reference to other charges."

3. As to this letter: Does it show the Doorkeeper to be a man of such sense and discretion as to be intrusted with so responsible a post as he holds in this House?

Much stress has been laid, in extenuation of this letter: First, upon the way in which it was introduced to the public; second, upon the fact that it was written in utter abandon, and confided to a familiar and trusted friend.

As to the first, while it may and does redound to the credit of the Doorkeeper that he resisted the importunity to appoint those who held the letter over him in terrarem, while he might have suppressed the publication by a disregard of his duty, the committee give to him the full benefit of his explanation of the occasion when and the person to whom the letter was written in privacy.

As to the second, it is not for the committee to inquire how it saw the light or the motives of those who produced it in print. Our inquiry is whether the letter itself is an index of a character unfit to serve Congress as Doorkeeper, to dispense the large patronage of that office and maintain the confidential relations which are so intimately interwoven between legislators and this custodian of their Hall.

Before examining the letter itself, it might be well to examine into the duties of this office. The Doorkeeper, under Rule 10, is especially made the confidant of the House. In addition to the official oath prescribed by section 1757 Revised Statutes, he is required to take an oath to "keep the secrets of the House." The privileges of the Hall are under his control. He is to execute the one hundred and thirty-fourth and one hundred and thirty-fifth rules, as to those privileges, and these extend to the rooms upon the same floor of the Hall and leading into the same, and to the Reporters' Gallery. The abuse and scandal which an unfaithful Doorkeeper or his subordinates may cause were illustrated in a former Congress, when one assistant confessed and swore that he received many thousand dollars for granting admission to lobbyists interested in the Pacific mail subsidy. By Rule 27 the Doorkeeper is held responsible for all the furniture, books, or other public property in the several committee or other rooms under his charge. He is required to make an inventory of the same. When Congress is not in session, he remains here in trust, to preserve the public property. He is held responsible for missing articles. He provides fuel and other accommodations, in recess, for the subsequent session, under section 73, Revised Statutes. He is the intermediary of our messages to the Senate. Under him, as his appointees, are the superintendents of the folding-room, document-room, messengers, pages, folders, and laborers. The custody and distribution of documents are under his charge, the importance of which no one can so well know as a member. In cases of vacancies in the offices of Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms, or their absence or inability to act, the duties of the Clerk, relative to the preparation of the roll, devolve upon him by the thirty-third section of Revised Statutes. In fact he may, by the preparation of the roll, actually determine, in certain eventualities, the very constitution and party character of the House at its organization. This, although contingent, is an important power; and while the law remains, the public will allow no hazard of its abuse by the selection of doubtful officers.

Some of these important functions are devolved upon him, and others may be devolved. All agree now that greater scrutiny than has usually been exercised in the selection of this officer should be exercised. If a mistake has been made in the selection of the present incumbent, is it evidenced by his letter to Mr. Maddox; and if that be so, what is the remedy?

Even those who find nothing bad in the character of the man who wrote this letter, and who acquit its writer of any misconduct in office, agree that the letter is supremely weak and foolish. It evidences an unbalanced and unreliable judgment. Making every allowance for the privacy of the letter, it betrays ignorance of his relations to the House and its members. The appointment of his son, a mere boy, to a twenty-one-hundred-dollar place, and when that was vacated by him then his re-appointment and retention as file-clerk at a salary of $1,800, shows a disregard of a principle of civil service frequently commented upon of late, and which demands unselfishness, fitness, maturity, and capacity. The letter betrays a giddiness which betokens a character unsuited to the serious and responsible position, which a Doorkeeper should possess. His retention of the position would bring the House into ridicule and contempt among that class of "plain people" who are the best critics of the decorum and decency which should attach to the one of the two first law-making bodies in our land. Setting aside all charges as to the personal character of the officer, there is enough in the letter, which it is needless and painful to analyze further, to show that he is unfit for the position. Whether it be a public or private letter, it is indicative of the spirit of the officer as regards the honor of members of the House and the respect due from him to other high officers of the Government.

The committee therefore report the following:

1. That the office of Doorkeeper be vacated by its present incumbent.

2. That the duties of Doorkeeper be, and the same are hereby, devolved upon and consolidated with the office of Sergeant-at-Arms until otherwise ordered.

[Exhibit A.]

To the honorable the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives:

In view of the serious character of the charges brought against me by Hon. JOHN D. WHITE, on the 13th instant, in the House, by the reading of various papers, and which were by resolution referred to your committee for investigation, I beg of you to permit me to make a full statement in defense to all of the said charges, without regard to any technical rules of the House to the contrary. And in pursuance thereof I will make the following statement:

First. In regard to the indictment spoken of by Welch in his letter that was read in the House at the time the said charges were made I will state: During the year 1870 D. W. Jones and myself were in partnership in the keeping of the Crab Orchard Springs, in the county of Lincoln, State of Kentucky; and about the 1st of November, 1870, I took out several policies of insurance on one-half of the buildings and furniture at the springs, representing one-half interest therein. Some time in the month of December, 1870, D. W. Jones made a survey of the main buildings of the springs property for the purpose of procuring a policy of insurance on same, and made the application to take out a policy for $7,500 on the main building alone. The main building was worth some ten or eleven thousand dollars, and not more, and Jones had only one-half interest in that. (See affidavit of Thomas C. Gale, here filed as part hereof, and marked A.)

On the 1st or 2d day of February, 1871, I left the Crab Orchard Springs to go to Louisville on private business; and as I was starting from the depot there were several persons, citizens of the place, standing around the depot, and some one of them asked me where I was going. I answered that I was going to Louisville to see about the insurance on the property. During my absence on that occasion I canceled about $9,500 insurance on my part of the property at the springs. The main building caught fire and burned down. Jones testified on the examining trial of Tom Scott the fire was discovered about eleven o'clock on the 4th. (See transcript of the evidence taken on the examining trial of Tom Scott, which is here filed, marked B, and made a part of this statement.) On my return home I found two of my sons and the said Tom Scott under arrest and charged with setting fire to the said main building, and that this man William G. Welch had volunteered his services to defend my sons, and I also learned that this man William G. Welch had been employed by Jones to aid in extorting the confession from Tom Scott. I therefore concluded it would not be safe to rely on him, and at once engaged the services of Hon. M. J. DURHAM and Thomas W. Bullitt. Welch informed us what confession would be proven; he stated that he was present at the confession, and that said Scott stated that I had held an interview with him before I left and persuaded him to agree to set fire to the said building, and that I would go to Louisville first and get out an insurance on the building; and that I had done so, and written back to my sons to that effect, and they told him of it, and to go on and burn the house; that it was all right for the burning, as the insurance had been completed. Upon getting this information Judge DURHAM advised me to send down to Louisville for the insurance agent and have him come up and bring the canceled policy, that is, the one that had been canceled just two or three days before the burning; and upon the production of the canceled policy with the testimony of the insurance agent the warrants were dismissed against my two sons, though Tom Scott was held over to answer an indictment. The postmaster of Stanford, I think, and one of the deputy United States marshals went on Tom Scott's bail-bond for his appearance, which was $450, and took him down to Louisville, where he was persuaded to bring suit against D. W. Jones and others for his arrest and maltreatment. (See transcript of the case, which will be filed as soon as it reaches me.) I have information that the transcript has been made out and mailed to me on Monday last.) After this suit was brought, this same man Welch and his party threatened me with a prosecution if I did not induce Tom Scott to dismiss his suit. I had no control over Tom Scott and could not have influenced him in that matter, and would not have stopped his suit then if I could, because I was anxious to have the charges against me and my two sons fully investigated.

True to the threat made by Welch and his then compeers, they did have us indicted, (copies of which indictments are now before this committee.) The trials were had under all of the three said indictments, and the proof so signally failed to sustain the charges under two of the indictments that the judge—Hon. Mr. Fox—refused to let the jury act on them; but at the earnest urgency of my counsel the judge did let the jury have one of the cases, and the jury were not out more than five minutes at most before they brought in a verdict of not guilty. All of these facts Hon. Judge DURHAM ought to remember, except the fact that William G. Welch gave the information as to the extent of Tom Scott's confession and stating that he was with the party at the time the confession was made, as his (Hon. Judge DURHAM's) testimony in the case of Tom Scott vs. Jones et al. differed from mine in this particular: The policy of insurance I took out on the springs property in the fall of 1870 was for $10,500, I think, and when in Louisville during the first part of February, 1871, I canceled $9,500 of it, I think; so there could have existed no pecuniary inducement for me to have desired the property destroyed, and inasmuch as Jones had a policy on the property for more than its value, malice against him could not have induced me to desire its destruction; besides I would have lost too heavily myself to desire its destruction, however much malice I may have borne to Jones.

William G. Welch states in his letter that a week or more after the burning of the house at Crab Orchard Springs he and others took Tom Scott out and extorted the confession from him against me.

I presume it is true they took him out and made him confess, but the evidence on the examining trial shows that the burning took place on the night of the 4th and that Tom Scott was taken out on the night of the 6th, being only two days after the burning. If Hon. Judge DURHAM fails to remember all of the foregoing facts, I will ask this committee to send for Thomas W. Bullitt and Robert Jacobs, the latter having been a partner of Hon. Judge DURHAM, and as such engaged in the trial of my cases.

I regret that the evidence cannot be got at just as it was detailed on the trial of Tom Scott's suit vs. D. W. Jones et. al., so as this committee could have it to scrutinize just as the jury did in that case; suffice it to say the verdict of the jury sustained my version of the facts, and, in addition, my recollection is that my testimony was corroborated in every particular in which Hon. Judge DURHAM and I differed. However, if it had been true that I had sworn falsely in that court, as Welch would have you believe, why did he not have me indicted for it? Can it be said that he did not bear sufficient malice to have inflicted any punishment in his power upon me? This wonderful letter of his too strongly portrays malice of the deepest dye to authorize a denial on his part of its existence, for this letter is evidently a part of an organized plan to black-mail or break me down, or to damage the interest of the democratic organization by aiding in the concocting of diabolical slanders against an appointee of the democratic House. But he says he is a democrat; then what an immense feeling of bitter malice he must entertain against me to have overlooked the mortification to the party he is producing in his combining with Clancy, Maddox, and Purnell to break down one of the party's appointees; so that his insinuation that the United States court was not the proper court for him to enforce justice is a mere badge adopted by him to escape the glaring falsity of the whole of his charges against me.

Secondly. That part of affidavit made by Thomas F. Purnell, now before you, is too base and contemptible to be noticed; but, as it is a part of the plan of the quarto of the perfumed geentry Maddox, Clancy, Welch, and Purnell, I will call attention to the letter now before this committee, written by L. Payton, and a letter here filed marked "Davis," from Ex-Governor Davis, of Texas, and the resolution of his own party assembled in State convention in the State of Texas, contained in a pamphlet here filed as part of this statement, on pages 15 and 21, both of which are marked with pencil mark around the sections, and the unpublished part of this same affidavit now before this committee made by this flower of Texas, Purnell, to show that he is not only a thief but a perjured outlaw. Nothing approximating the statement he makes about me and my wife ever occurred. Of course I do not know personally what my wife may have done, but I do know that after living with her for about twenty-six years that she is incapable of telling a falsehood; and I believe as firmly what she tells me as I could believe if I were personally cognizant of what she might be talking of, and on the strength of her denial I deny the whole of that affidavit so far as it relates to either my wife or myself.

Thirdly. I now come to that ill-advised letter. It was written under the seal of confidence to one I had befriended in a material way, and one who had befriended me in the same way; one who always made the most fulsome attestation and demonstrations of friendship, so that I had a right to regard him as a true friend. Under these circumstances I thought no harm could come out of an absurd gasconade for amusement sake, while it was intended for no eye except the person addressed, particularly as the whole letter was made so ridiculous that it was impossible for Maddox, to whom it was addressed, to construe it in any other way than as a little fun, and he never did construe it otherwise until after he had conceived the idea of engaging in this diabolical combination with his compeers, Welch, Purnell, and Clancy, which quarto are now seeking to induce you to put a serious interpretation on it for their own base purposes.

I confess it was a foolish letter, and that a serious mistake was made in writing such a letter to such a man as Maddox. But, while a foolish letter, it injures no one except myself. The persons named in it are of too high standing for such a mention of them to affect their character or standing in the slightest degree; it was not intended to injure or reflect on any one. At that time my feelings were kind and grateful to all of the members of the House for their having honored me with the office I hold, and of course I could not have desired to do any one of them an injury or injustice in any form.

When I first learned that this letter had not been destroyed but was in the hands of my enemies, I made every honorable effort to get it. It could not be procured on any other condition than by giving an appointment to the holder of it, and some of my friends advised me to give the appointment for it. But, upon serious reflection, I came to the conclusion that such a purchase of the letter would not only be an improper use of the appointing power of my office but would have seriously impaired my usefulness in the discharge of my duties in the office, for if I could be forced to appoint any man I might be forced to tolerate any sort of misconduct on his part.

I well knowing there was nothing in the letter that would damage anybody except myself, although I had not seen the letter since it was mailed by me to Maddox, I preferred to submit to the humiliation of the publication of it than to sell out an appointment and my own control over that part of my office. I have not seen the original of this letter, and cannot say whether the published copy is a true one or not.

The foregoing contain the exact facts in regard to this letter, and therefore is all that I can say about it.

All of which is respectfully submitted to your honorable committee.

L. H. FITZHUGH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolutions are now before the House for action, and the Clerk will again read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, First, that the office of Doorkeeper be vacated by the present incumbent.

Resolved, Second, that the duties of Doorkeeper be, and the same are hereby, devolved upon and consolidated with the office of Sergeant-at-Arms until otherwise ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. Unless some debate is desired on the report and accompanying resolutions, I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask whether this recommendation of the committee is not susceptible of division?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Then I ask for a division of the proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are substantive propositions, different, and can be divided.

Mr. RANDALL. They were designedly made so.

Mr. KASSON. Let the resolutions be again read.

The resolutions were again read.

Mr. RANDALL. As this division has been called for, it may be proper for me to say that the second resolution merely transfers the duties temporarily. The House to-morrow, or next week, or the beginning of the next session can provide for Doorkeeper as heretofore. The committee thought it important that security should be had, and therefore assigned one of the officers to discharge the duty temporarily. They did not wish to express any sentiment in reference to the permanent consolidation of these two offices. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the adoption of the first resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the office of Doorkeeper be vacated by its present incumbent.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 80, noes 18.

So (no further count being demanded) the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the second resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the duties of Doorkeeper be, and the same are hereby, devolved upon and consolidated with the office of Sergeant-at-Arms until otherwise ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the gentleman leave out the word "consolidated."

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. It should be stricken out if the gentleman means to provide only for a temporary arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee were unwilling to make any recommendations for permanent action of that kind.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I would not say "consolidated with the office of Sergeant-at-Arms," because it might complicate matters afterward.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the resolution read "devolved upon the Sergeant-at-Arms," and not "consolidated with the office of Sergeant-at-Arms."

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to so modify the resolution to say "Sergeant-at-Arms" instead of "office of Sergeant-at-Arms."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment will accordingly be made.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. The word "temporarily" should be incorporated in the resolution, as that will make it more distinct. We have already vacated one office, and are now devolving the duties of that office upon another office—the office of Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to inserting the word "temporarily," if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I think the word "temporarily" should be incorporated in the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, that will be done.

Mr. MORRISON. That is provided for by saying "until otherwise ordered."

Mr. RANDALL. It is all there now. I ask the resolution be read as it would be if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the duties of Doorkeeper be, and the same are hereby, temporarily devolved upon the Sergeant-at-Arms until otherwise ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. The word "temporarily" is not needed. The resolution as reported will entirely answer the purpose, and covers the object desired by the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The word "temporarily" will not be inserted.

Mr. KASSON. Before the vote is taken on this resolution I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the committee have consulted the Revised Statutes regulating and prescribing certain duties of the Doorkeeper of the House and ascertained positively whether by simple resolution those duties can be performed by the Sergeant-at-Arms?

Mr. RANDALL. The provisions of the Revised Statutes are recited in the body of the report.

Mr. GARFIELD. Devolving those duties upon the Sergeant-at-Arms does not carry the salary with it.

Mr. KASSON. I am not speaking of the salary; but the Doorkeeper having been removed can we provide by simple resolution the Sergeant-at-Arms shall perform the duties attached to that office under the Revised Statutes? There are provisions of the Revised Statutes which I am sure cannot be transferred by simple resolution of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. We simply provide the duties of the Doorkeeper temporarily shall be performed by another officer of this House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the resolution in its present shape is a very proper one. I desire, however, to suggest that I think gentlemen of the majority may find it necessary very soon to make provision for a permanent Doorkeeper with full powers. I think they will find that the consolidation of the two officers cannot be made without additional legislation, and I doubt whether such consolidation would be wise if made.

Mr. MORRISON. This is not our last man. We have some others.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio will see that by this resolution we make provision that we shall not be without some one to perform the duties of Doorkeeper. If the majority should determine on a consolidation of the two offices, then there would be a necessity for some legislation.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As these questions of personal privilege are becoming rather frequent and inasmuch as the rule gives the Chair the privilege to entertain them or not, the Chair hereafter will submit them to the House in every case where he has any doubt.

Mr. HALE. I raise the question of order that after the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has been recognized by the Chair any question of privilege must remain in abeyance unless the gentleman from Georgia yields the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I understood that I was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me to make a motion.

Mr. BLOUNT. I decline to yield to the gentleman. I do not know how much my yielding to him might imply.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CROUNSE. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which on Saturday a copy of the opinion of the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the State of Iowa in the case of The United States ex rel. Hall et al. vs. The Union Pacific Railroad, upon the subject of the tolls charged by that road, was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

POWDER MAGAZINE ON ELLIS'S ISLAND.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARDENBERGH] to offer a resolution for reference.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Whereas, by reason of the proximity to the most densely-populated portions of the cities of Jersey City and New York of the powder-magazine on Ellis's Island, in the bay of New York, a great sense of danger and insecurity to the lives of a million of people exists: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be requested to consider and report a bill providing for the speedy removal of the said powder-magazine to a location where such danger cannot exist.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Saturday the pending amendment was that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "seventy-five hundred men," in lines 16 and 17 insert the following:

For pay of chaplains, first five years after date of appointment, $1,200; after five years from date of appointment, $1,800.

And the pay of all other officers on the active list of the Navy shall remain as it is now provided by law; and when any of the officers hereinbefore mentioned, except the admiral, vice-admiral, and naval constructors and assistant naval constructors, shall be on shore duty or on leave or waiting orders, their pay shall be reduced from the rates herein fixed in the same proportion as it is reduced from sea pay by existing law.

And after the passage of this act there shall be no promotion to the grade of rear-admiral until their number shall be reduced below three; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of commodore until their number shall be reduced below six; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of captain until their number shall be reduced below forty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of commander until their number shall be reduced below fifty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of lieutenant-commander until their number shall be reduced below sixty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of lieutenant until their number shall be reduced below one hundred and fifty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of chief engineer until their number shall be reduced below forty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of passed assistant engineer until their number shall be reduced below seventy-three; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of assistant engineer until their number shall be reduced below forty-seven; and no promotion or appointment shall be made to the grades of medical director and medical inspector and pay director and pay inspector and assistant naval constructor and civil engineer; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of paymaster until their number shall be reduced below twenty-five; and no promotion to the grade of naval constructor until their number shall be reduced below six. All officers of the volunteer service of the Navy shall be discharged from service after the 1st of July, 1876; and laws authorizing the appointment or employment by the Secretary of the Navy of any person in the volunteer Navy shall be, and are hereby, repealed: Provided, That all civil engineers now in the naval service shall be discharged on the 1st day of July, 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] who has charge of this bill on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, desires to make a remark or two. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise simply for the purpose of saying that when these amendments were offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and printed, I called the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to them, and the committee determined to take no action favorable or unfavorable upon them. Coming from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Appropriations thought it proper and right that they should be considered by the House, that the House might take what action upon them might seem to be right.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The purpose that the Committee on Naval Affairs had in directing me to report this amendment for the consideration of the House at the present time was to align itself, so to speak, with the spirit of reformation already entered upon by this House in obedience to the public sentiment of the country. The action of the committee was for the purpose of reducing not only the pay of the officers, but the number of the officers. I call the attention of the committee to the fact that there are sixteen hundred and twelve commissioned officers in the United States Navy, and that, taking the cadet engineers and the cadet midshipmen and the volunteer officers of the Navy, there are some nineteen hundred and fifty-three officers; that when you come to apply that number or divide it among the number of men that are provided for in this bill, you have four men for each officer; and that this is disproportionate; in other words, that the naval service has become topheavy; and that it is with a view to economy, as well as efficiency in the service, that the Naval Committee has made the recommendations which I have submitted to the House.

First, sir, is the reduction of pay. I have to state to this committee that the reduction of pay averages about 10 per cent. In some cases it is more; in other cases it is not. But the main purpose kept in view on the part of my committee was to make this reduction conform to and harmonize with the reduction made by the House in the pay of the military branch of the service. Let gentlemen reflect for a moment that according to your present Naval Register you would have twelve officers of the rank of major-general, a greater number of officers of that rank for seventy-five hundred men, if you permit the service to remain as it is, than there are in the Army for 25,000 men. The committee propose to reduce, not violently, not in a manner to do any injustice to anybody, but by the slow process of death to reduce the number of rear-admirals down to three. And this idea they have followed out throughout the various grades in the naval service.

All that we propose is to make the pay of officers in the Navy conform to the number of men and also to the number of ships that we may be able to put afloat. Then again, in offering this amendment—because I have to confine myself to the five-minute rule—I have to call the attention of the committee to the very fact that it recommends an abolition of the officers in the volunteer Navy, of whom nineteen are assistant surgeons. When you look at the number of surgeons now in the regular naval service, the propriety of the proposition of the committee to reduce that number will be apparent. I have to inquire what is the necessity, what the occasion, or what the demand in the public service that you shall maintain and pay officers who come in merely under the nomination of the Secretary of the Navy? Again, there are ten officers now in the service, most of whom have been on duty at the navy-yards, known as civil engineers. From the examinations made by the committee, and from the almost universal opinion of every competent officer of the Navy of the United States, there is at the present time no occasion or demand for the services of these men. It is proposed by this amendment to abolish these useless and unnecessary officers in the naval service. Taking the abolition of these two corps, so to call them, you have a reduction in the expenditures of the Government, first, as to the volunteer officers of the Navy, $40,000; and second, as to the civil engineers, of about $24,000 per annum; and it is in this spirit and view, and not in hostility to the naval service, that the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs have made their recommendation. I may say that it is my object and purpose hereafter to make the pay of officers of the Navy conform and harmonize with the pay given to officers of the Army, grade for grade, and rank for rank. I believe that would be just, not to the officers of the Navy only, but to the people of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I want the committee to realize fully the importance of this amendment and then take the responsibility. It is the first time upon discussion, and the matter being fully presented to the House, that the question has come up since the great war, of striking at one of the military establishments of the Government. Now, I do not know that anything I can say or that any gentleman can say on this side of the House would prevent this reduction of the pay of naval officers being carried by the majority in this House, but if it is carried the responsibility, Mr. Chairman, must be theirs. Everybody realizes, and none will admit it more fully than gentlemen on the other side, that the exploits of the Union Navy during the war added luster to the American name. I say nothing of the exploits of those who were opposed to that Navy. Gentlemen should realize that in this country, under our frame-work of Government, we had but one way in which to reward the gallant men who brought up our flag from that period of war and of bloodshed. It was not by ennobling; we had no lordships: we had no orders of knighthood; we had no grants of land; we had no wealth to endow them with as other countries had, but we paid for their services by the establishing of rear-admiralships and admiralships, and we affixed to those ranks pay commensurate with that of like rank in other countries. Those men are to-day occupying those offices. I find upon the naval list proposed to be struck at by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] while representing himself to be a friend of the Navy, such names as Porter, and Rowan, and Davis, and Rodgers, and Worden of the Monitor, and I might go on enumerating a dozen others. These men have had their pay fixed undoubtedly at rates higher than those paid anterior to the war largely in consideration of their services, and now it is proposed to strike at them, to take from the Admiral $3,000 a year, and to take from the rear-admirals, the commanders, the captains, and all the officers down in the same proportion.

Now this is the only way in which you can strike at these men unless you abolish them completely. The gentleman has not yet got the hardihood to propose to abolish these gallant men from the service and to send them out to the country with nothing with which to maintain themselves, but so far as he dare he proposes to reduce their pay. I say that the pay of American naval officers is to-day lower than that of any other navy of a like size in the civilized world. I say that in addition to the pay of officers in other navies they receive a fund so that in foreign countries they may keep up a system of entertainments, and not only protect the citizens of their country, but carry on the duties of hospitality which are recognized as appropriate to the navy. Look at the British Navy Register. I find that an admiral has in addition to a salary almost equal in amount to that given to ours, for what is called table money, to the amount of $8,000 a year, and I know that when a rear-admiral in European, in the Mediterranean squadron, in the Asiatic waters, and on the South American coast, whenever he invites a stranger to dine and give him a good table and a bottle of wine, has to pay for it out of his own pay.

I know that these men who command fleets and whom we were taught during four years' of experience of war to look up to and venerate under the pay they receive now cannot possibly save money out of their salaries, just as it is impossible for a poor clerk in the Departments to save out of his salary. Let me say further that this motion to strike at the American Navy does not come from the Committee on Appropriations. That committee, in addition to the many good deeds it has done, has done some things in which I could not concur, but it has spared the military and naval establishments of the country; it has not tried to strike down these, and I believe the American people do not want the pay of these gallant men who served during the war to be stricken down by this House.

I do not know that my words of protest will avail an instant. But I say again that this is the first time that on discussion this question has been presented to this House, and gentlemen on the other side must take the responsibility.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting at the close of next to the last paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That there shall be allowed and paid to each commissioned officer in the Navy below the rank of commodore, including chaplains and others having rank or pay, 10 per cent. of their current yearly pay for each term of five years' service.

Mr. MILLS. In drawing up the amendment which has been submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] it was the object of the Committee on Naval Affairs to make it conform to the bill passed by the House of Representatives reducing the pay of the Army; and rank for rank it has done so, as closely as it was possible and do what we believed to be justice. I believe that with the single exception of one case—the case of ensign—the pay of the line-officers of the Army and of the Navy is made the same.

In drawing up the bill for the pay of naval officers there was omitted a provision that belongs to the pay of the Army; that is, longevity allowance. I offer now an amendment, transcribing word for word the language of the clause which prescribes the longevity pay of officers of the Army, and making it apply to the corresponding ranks in the Navy, giving them 10 per cent. additional pay for each five years of service. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DANFORD. I desire to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the amendment offered to this appropriation bill by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] as it affects the pay of the officers of the Navy. As has been stated by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] it was undoubtedly the intention in draughting this bill to make the pay of the officers of the Navy, rank for rank, correspond with the pay of the officers of the Army as fixed by the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] and which bill passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

I desire, however, to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to one fact: Take the pay proposed for a colonel in the Army and the pay proposed for a captain in the Navy. Those ranks, as I understand, are by law assimilated ranks. The pay of a colonel of the Army while on field duty is $3,500 a year; if on post duty his pay is the same, and if unassigned to duty his pay is the same.

If a colonel of the Army is on leave—and I will remark here that officers of the Army are seldom placed on leave except at their own request—his pay would be $1,750 a year. Now take the pay of a captain in the Navy as proposed to be fixed by this bill. His sea pay would be $3,500, the same as the pay of a colonel of the Army on field duty. If, however, a captain in the Navy is on shore duty, should this bill become a law just as it has been proposed to this committee, his pay would be but $2,722.21 a year. If unassigned or waiting orders, his pay would be $2,177.91; while his furlough pay would be but $1,088.96 a year. Therefore, in this attempt to assimilate the pay of officers of the Navy with that of officers of the Army, it will be found upon examination that great injustice will be done to the officers of the Navy.

Just here let me say that this is evidence of the truth of the remark made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] on last Friday evening, that this kind of legislation is most reprehensible. We are attempting to attach to an appropriation bill and to put through under the five-minute rule of debate, without proper opportunity for discussion, a bill that affects the entire Navy of the United States in all its parts; not only the pay of its officers, but the character of the service itself.

If you will take into consideration the bill offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] and now pending as an amendment to this appropriation bill, you will find that there will be absolutely no promotion in the Navy from the lower ranks and grades of officers for years to come, for an ordinary lifetime. The effect of such legislation as this will be to drive out of the Navy the men who are worthy to be in it, those who are likely to make the most gallant and efficient officers, and to leave in the Navy the drones, the men who cannot earn a livelihood outside of it, if there be any such in it.

This bill should be considered carefully by every member of this House before the proposition of the Committee on Naval Affairs is made a part of the law of the land, before the pay of the officers of the Navy is stricken down in this manner.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment to the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying to the House, in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] that he misconceives the spirit that actuated not only myself but the majority of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs in bringing in the report they have made to this House. I am and claim to be an American citizen, and with that gentleman I share the pride which I believe every American citizen should and ought to feel in the United States Navy and in the achievements of its gallant officers. I pay tribute to the heroism and intelligence of a Porter and a Rowan, who are living, as I honor the memory of a Cushing, who is dead. But, sir, when I and those who are associated with me come to look at this bill, we do not feel that we are under an obligation to pay any more regard to officers of the Navy than has been paid by this House to the officers of your Army, your General, your Lieutenant-General, and other officers. Are those in one branch of the service entitled to more consideration on the part of the country than those in the other branch? I think not. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] stated that this was the first assault that had been made upon either branch of the service. He forgot that the House had already acted upon the bill reported by my friend from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE. No; I did not forget that. I think that was as objectionable as this.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I state to the gentleman from Maine and others that I am not here to legislate in the interest of any class. If the people of my section alone paid the taxes, I might be supposed to be governed by the sinister motive to which he would ascribe our action. He does injustice to himself as well as to me in making the ascription of any such motive.

But, sir, I remember, and the gentleman from Maine must know, that the gallant soldiers who were led by Sherman and Grant and the brave sailors who were led by Rowan and Porter are to-day taxpayers. When legislating here, it is my purpose (and I would be unworthy of a seat upon this floor if I had any other motive) to legislate for my whole country and every man in it, without regard to what may have been his past relations to the Government. I know that the tax-payers of the country embrace all classes of citizens; and from their sweat and toil come the means by which the Army and the Navy are sustained. It is for these men, poor and down-trodden—the men whose little homes are to-day passing under the sheriff's hammer to be sold for taxes, the men who are struggling with the question what they shall do for the support of their wives and little ones—it is for these men that we are to legislate, not for their dishonor or injury; for, I repeat again that from the bottom of my heart, I am ready to pay tribute to the gallant men of both branches of the service.

But can any man say that it is just to the people of the United States that for seventy-five hundred seamen upon fifty vessels we should tax our citizens with the payment of one officer for almost every four men in the service? Is that just? That is the question for this House to consider. I repeat it again—and in this I believe I express the views of my committee—that we are here to legislate for no one man and for no one class. We legislate for the honor of the country, with a view to the perpetuation of those institutions under which we delight to live.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that the Committee of the Whole ought to be informed of one or two facts in connection with the pay of the Army and the Navy, as these two branches of the service seem to be brought into comparison here. In the first place I wish to state one fact which I believe the gentleman from Maine will corroborate, that the pay of the Navy, all things considered, is less than that of the Army. Hence, if this were a proposition to reduce the pay of the Navy relatively it would be unjust, because it would place the pay of the Navy below the point to which the House has determined to bring down that of the Army. But if I have understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] correctly—and if I misstate his position he will set me right—the pay as fixed in his amendment for the Navy is made to conform to the salaries fixed in the bill which passed this House with reference to the Army.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The active pay.

Mr. RANDALL. The active pay. Now really I cannot see a great deal of objection to making the pay of the Navy conform to that which the House by a very decided vote fixed as the pay of the Army. The truth is that both branches of the service, the Army and the Navy, are very much too large as to the number of officers; and but for the great respect and regard which all of us have for both branches of the service, the number of the officers in both would be very seriously reduced. But I, like other members, appreciate the services of both the Army and the Navy, the dangers which they have encountered in the past and may have to encounter in the future.

In the Army there are 2,168 officers to command 25,000 men—one officer to every eleven or twelve men. In the Navy there are thirteen hundred officers to command eighty-five hundred men—something like one officer for less than seven men. Now it will be readily seen that this proportion of officers is entirely too large. On a former occasion I stated the fact that according to good military authority nine hundred officers would be adequate to command the present force of the United States Army, 25,000 men, whether in the field or on peace service.

The next proposition is in respect to longevity. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] proposes to incorporate into the bill this mode of payment heretofore unknown in the Navy, so far as I am aware; and he proposes to adopt 10 per cent. as the basis of this compensation. The amount paid to the Army under the longevity provision is nearly $1,000,000; and I take it that the reason this method of payment has never heretofore been applied to the Navy is that the naval officers possess some advantages of which an Army officer is deprived; I allude to the distribution of prize-money. If, however, this House is determined to adopt the longevity clause as to the pay of the Navy, I hope it will be fixed on the basis of 5 per cent. instead of 10. This question of longevity pay as regards the Army has received a good deal of consideration and reflection from some of us who have been called upon to prepare appropriations for this purpose; and it has been thought proper that the sense of the House should be taken upon the question whether the longevity pay of the Army should not be reduced to 5 per cent. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman offering the amendment will fix 5 per cent. as the basis. It can hereafter be readily raised either in the Senate or in the conference committee if the proposition which will probably be made upon the Army bill to reduce the longevity pay of the Army to 5 per cent. should not be adopted.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment I will renew it.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BANKS. I renew it. I have no doubt these amendments by the Committee on Naval Affairs as well as by the Committee on Appropriations are made in perfectly good faith, and I wish to consider them in that light. I know very well there is great necessity for reduction in the expenditure of the Government, local as well as general, and I am willing to contribute to that end so far as I can understandingly and justly. But the disadvantage under which we labor as compared with members of those committees is that we have had no opportunity to study these questions or to comprehend the various minute details into which their several propositions enter. The naval appropriation bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] was in itself an entire new subject, and we had scarcely time to read it after listening to his lucid and just statement of the provisions embraced in it, which were more or less satisfactory, when these amendments—three or four of them from the Committee on Naval Affairs—were superadded. Both the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Georgia must see that it is quite impossible for this committee generally to comprehend them at once.

Now, what I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas is this, whether I understood him correctly to state when he introduced his amendment to the amendment that it was his intention and such was the effect to place officers of the Navy in regard to the pay to which his amendment refers upon the same basis and footing as Army officers of the same relative rank?

Mr. MILLS. It was the intention of the committee to do that, and we have labored with all our might to accomplish that very effect.

Mr. BANKS. That is satisfactory to me. Now, speaking for some of the naval officers who are my friends and who express a great deal of feeling in reference to this matter, they represent that the Army bill which passed the House fixed the rates of pay for various grades of officers and that the naval bill now pending in committee, while it professes to do the same thing, places the naval officers below the Army officers in point of pay, and they look upon that as amounting almost to reproach and censure. That, of course, the committee or the House itself will not desire to do.

I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to one or two of the cases presented here. One has been presented by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] and that is, a colonel, line and staff, of the Army receives when unassigned or off duty $3,500. A captain in the Navy, supposed to represent the same rank in the Navy as a colonel, line and staff, does in the Army, gets for the same service $2,179. In addition, the naval officers sustain the further disadvantage that Army officers are very rarely unassigned, very rarely off duty, except when on furlough or on leave, while it is a matter of continual occurrence on the part of naval officers that they are unassigned or waiting orders when they are reduced to this low grade of pay.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will turn to the present pay of a captain in the United States Navy he will see that his pay at sea is $4,500, on shore $3,500, and on leave or waiting orders $2,800. Now, turn to the amendment. Pro rata of reduction is made when upon leave and waiting orders. By applying that pro rata it will be seen that my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] is mistaken in his statement that it would reduce it to $1,000. Such would not be the operation of the amendment submitted to the House.

Mr. BANKS. I hope that may be so. We are unable, unhappily, to rest upon the statements of the gentlemen connected with the committee. I should be glad if this question were separated, so we could consider the amendments in detail first and then take up the appropriation bill by paragraphs afterward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time is expired.

Mr. BANKS. I will only ask, in conclusion, to have printed with my remarks the following table:

Table showing the pay of Army officers under House bill No. 2817 and the pay of Navy officers under House bill No. 3472.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not for me nor for any one in the House to assail the motives of another member, nor to find reasons why certain propositions are offered. The gentleman from Tennessee says his amendment which cuts down the pay of naval officers and forbids and shuts out promotion for years is offered in good faith. I have no doubt of it. The measure of that faith, the purpose of it, I judge from its results. It is a novelty to me that it is a friendly thing to the American Navy to propose to reduce the compensation of its officers and shut them out in future years from that advance which is the great aim and object in life of all of us.

I had not time in my brief remarks a few moments ago more than to mention this feature of the amendment in shutting off from promotion by reducing the higher ranks in the Navy and leaving these gallant men at a stand-still. The effect on the spirit of the Navy, Mr. Chairman, is tremendous. It has been expressed by the gentleman from Ohio in this, that it drives the best men out of the Navy and keeps the poorest men in. If the gentleman seeks to accomplish that and yet claims to be a friend of the Navy, his friendship is different from mine.

The gentleman says that I forget that a like measure in regard to the Army has passed this House. I forget no such thing. I remember it well, but I believe that was as objectionable as this. I had forgotten nothing of it. What I said was that this was the first time upon fair notice and discussion that the proposition to strike a fell blow at either of the military establishments had been before the House, and I repeat it. For that matter came up in the morning hour, without any notice that it was to be brought up, and with little or no discussion; nothing I believe was said except a brief presentation of the subject on the part of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HALE. I have not much time to yield.

Mr. BANNING. I merely wanted to say that I asked the House to discuss it, and they declined; nobody wanted to discuss it.

Mr. HALE. That is not for the gentleman to say. It passed without discussion. It was as objectionable as this measure in striking at the Army as this strikes at the Navy. And the people are not demanding it. This Committee on Naval Affairs has perambulated the country from north to south, bearing messages of investigation from the House of Representatives to every yard on the sea-coast. And I have failed to discover in any testimony that I have read where a single man has come to the committee asking that the pay of the naval force be reduced and that promotion be stopped.

The Committee on Appropriations, dealing with these considerations that the gentleman brings in here in regard to the amount of expenditures from the Treasury and the burdens upon the people, has sat early and late; it is almost the only committee that has not been vexed by the strife of investigation, but has been dealing with material matters of dollars and cents. And that committee, with a majority upon the other side of the House of course, led by the veteran from Pennsylvania, who in season and out of season urges his ery for reduction, and a uniform reduction of 10 per cent., has not thought it advisable to strike at this branch of the Government. And yet the gentleman from Tennessee, representing the Naval Committee, that has not taken a shred of testimony, and that brings no word from the sovereign people, whom I represent as well as he, comes in here and says that the people demand that the Navy shall be struck this fell blow. I do not believe it. I believe that in this matter the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations represents better the feeling of the country than this action of the Naval Committee.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I renew it, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. I merely wish to say one word. The gentleman from Maine says the bill reported by the Military Committee was a stroke at the Army. The only officers of the Army whose pay it reduces are those whose pay it reduces to $5,000, $6,000, $8,000, and $10,000.

The gentleman from Maine says this will drive officers from the service. I defy him to rise in his place and tell me one of the men whose pay is thus reduced who has spoken of leaving the service in consequence of this proposed reduction. It is a very easy thing to talk, Mr. Chairman, about striking at the Army and striking at the Navy and all that——

Mr. HALE. In reply to the gentleman's question I will ask him to tell me where a single demand came to him for this reduction that he embodied in his bill.

Mr. BANNING. I will tell the gentleman. It came from every taxpayer in this country.

Mr. HALE. Name them.

Mr. BANNING. It came from men all over the country; from among your own constituents. In the change of the character of this House the demand came from a majority of the people. The bill gives brigadier-generals $5,000, major-generals $6,000, the lieutenant-general $8,000, and the General $10,000. And it is as much as they ought to have. The bill was not only supported by this side of the House, but when the opportunity was offered there was not a man on that side of the House who rose in his place to say one word against it. But, on the other hand, many men on that side of the House, who had considered the question and knew the condition of the country and of the Treasury, voted for it.

It is, Mr. Chairman, very cheap work for gentlemen to charge upon this floor that this is a stroke at the Army. There is nobody upon this side of the House or upon the committee that reported the bill but thinks as well of the Army as the honorable gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the gentleman say that nobody said a word against the bill?

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman from Ohio, my colleague, said he would speak on behalf of a member of the committee who is absent, and present some objections to the bill. But that member of the committee was not opposed to the passage of the bill, although he belonged to the other side of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the country will find fault with this reduction. I think it is right, I think it is necessary, and I think, too, it is patriotic. These men whose pay we are reducing served no better than hundreds who are getting nothing. They served well. We do not, as the gentleman says, give them this large pay because we have no knighthoods to offer them, no honors such as they have in England. These men did not fight for money, but for the Government, for the honor of the American Navy and the honor of the American Army, and the protection of the American flag.

Mr. WILLARD. I rise, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, as well as to submit a few remarks in regard to the policy proposed by the bill itself under consideration.

And I would say as a preliminary that I have supported most of the measures for retrenchment and economy which have been proposed to the House during the present session, but I am fully convinced that the reduction proposed by the present measure differs materially from the system of retrenchment which has characterized the appropriation bills which have hitherto been presented for our discussion. So far as regards the expenditures which are made in order to conduct the ordinary administration of affairs, I can well conceive that in this time of business stringency we should take steps in the direction of economy; but when we come to national protection, when we come to that great arm of our national defense, the Navy of the United States, the case is entirely different. History should teach us something in regard to this question. We know that when this Government was founded one of the very first measures proposed to Congress by President Washington was the establishment of a navy, and that Navy was fostered under his administration and under that of his successor; but when Mr. Jefferson came into power, he proposed a reduction of the naval force, and Congress followed him in the measure; but no sooner had this been done, Mr. Chairman, than we found a war upon us, and so the reduction proved to be unwise and impolitic, and the country was required to put forth all its energies to retrieve the error. Under Mr. Madison's administration the Navy was encouraged, and also under that of Mr. Monroe, a policy which was continued by the several administrations that succeeded. In fact, there has been no opposition, as I understand, to this wise policy of enlarging, fostering, and improving the naval establishment of the Government until the present time.

Mr. Chairman, if we would learn nothing from our own history we have but to look at the history of nations to see that it is the naval power of a people which makes it great, and at this time when our commerce is prostrated, when our ships are driven from nearly every sea, when nearly all the commercial nations of Europe surpass us in their shipping on the Atlantic and the Pacific, is this a time for us to reduce our Navy? For nothing is more apparent from the lessons of human experience than the truth that the commerce of a nation is promoted, built up, and enlarged by the encouragement and advancement of its naval power. Are we prepared in the present juncture of our national existence to reject the whole teaching of this lesson and to strike down the hope of reviving one of our most important industries, and to place a most serious obstruction to the commercial growth and future power and greatness of our Republic? I trust not.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to withdraw his amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the House can well exaggerate the importance of the question that is presented to them in its bearing upon the morale and spirit of the Navy. To present this bill as a measure of retrenchment is merely absurd. It goes so much beyond that question of retrenchment that it strikes at the organization of the Navy and the safety of the country in future. It is not merely the reduction of the pay of a few officers; it is a reduction of the number in the service, in some instances amounting to more than one-half of all the officers in certain grades. For instance, the number of rear-admirals is decreased from twelve to three, the number of commodores from twenty-five to six, the number of captains from fifty to forty, the number of commanders from ninety down to fifty, the number of lieutenants from two hundred and eighty down to one hundred and fifty, and so on. It strikes a blow at our naval force and at our naval defense. It slaughters our officers as no naval battle ever slaughtered them. Yet gentlemen say they honor the Navy, and they wish to protect the Navy, and they are here to keep it efficient for the future. In professing to do that I repeat that the bill proposes under what it calls reduction of pay to commit a slaughter, to drive from the country's service half the number that the country's interests and the national protection demand for that service.

The gentleman says the tax-payers demand it. I tell the gentleman from Tennessee that, representing a population as laborious as his own, I affirm that not one man of the thousands there of either party ever raised his voice to ask that the Army or Navy should be punished, if you please so to call it, by a reduction of their pay or to ask that in the future the two great military arms of the country's defense shall be paralyzed to the extent of so large a portion of their efficient force. Let us have a war with Spain when this Navy shall have been reduced, where are we to find the officers to take the place of killed and wounded and to take command of the added vessels which we will need in the Navy and which we must employ? Shall we in time of peace reverse the old maxim that you are to prepare for war, and instead of that prepare for such weakness as to invite attack and to put our Army and Navy in the power of our enemies? Let us adhere, as the old democracy used to do, to the principle that in time of peace we should be prepared for war, and in that way we may more surely prevent war. I therefore repudiate as far as I can as a Representative of one constituency the declaration that the people have asked that this blow should be struck at the Navy any more than they did that a like blow should be struck at the Army.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that there are not more constituents of gentlemen from the South remaining in the service whom these gentlemen could consult as to what its needs are, if they do not wish to consult those who come from other portions of the Union. But to strike a blow at the whole organization of the Navy without a board of officers to examine and report upon the question, and to do it as a political measure, that you may go before the country and say that you have saved a certain amount of money, is something I venture to say is unworthy of honorable members of this House, and I thank the Committee on Appropriations that they have refrained from any such attempt to assail the Navy in their appropriation bill, and left it to another committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. In regard to anything that I may have to say or do in this House, the intimation that has just fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] shall not in the slightest degree influence that action. If he thinks it becomes him to make such reflections upon members of this House, I think it becomes me not to notice them.

In regard to this proposition which has been submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs, I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations declined to take action upon it, but proposed to allow members of the House to hear the Committee on Naval Affairs and then to determine what was right and proper in the premises. I am willing to go as far as any one in the matter of reducing the expenditures of the Government; but I wish to move with that caution which is demanded by our position and which the subject itself requires.

I find it difficult to support this proposition as now submitted. For some reason, doubtless a wise one, there have been established grades of pay connected with the same office in the Navy. There have been what is called sea-service pay, shore-duty pay, unassigned or waiting-orders pay, and furlough pay. There have been no such distinctions in the pay of officers of the Army.

Now let us examine the proposition of the Committee on Naval Affairs in this regard. It is proposed that the pay of Vice-Admiral of the Navy shall be the same as the pay of Lieutenant-General of the Army. Under the Army bill, which has passed this House, the pay of the Lieutenant-General was fixed at $8,000 a year. Under the proposition now pending the pay of a Vice-Admiral of the Navy will be $8,000 a year while on sea service. But there come in the several distinctions in regard to pay for shore duty, pay while unassigned or waiting orders, and furlough pay, which will put the officers of the Navy on an unequal footing with the officers of the Army.

Now if the Committee on Naval Affairs deem it wise and proper to put the officers of the Navy on exactly the same footing with the officers of the Army as regards their pay, they should have gone further and wiped out all these distinctions of pay in reference to the different kinds of service; and until that is done they will not have completed their work. Unless, therefore, the Committee on Naval Affairs so perfect what they have proposed I cannot give my vote to this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment to the amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly, I will do so.

Mr. MILLS. I renew the amendment to the amendment. Strange as it may seem to gentlemen on the other side of the House who have spoken in opposition to this amendment, I renew the assertion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that the amendment offered to this bill by the Committee on Naval Affairs was offered in good faith.

At the beginning of this session the Committee on Naval Affairs were charged with the duty of inquiring into abuses in the Navy, and also, if it were possible, in the present depressed condition of the finances of this country, in the prostrate condition of its industries, in view of the poverty that was increasing around every fireside until it amounted almost to destitution, and while the compensation of all other public officers was being reduced—they were directed to inquire if it was possible that the pay of officers of the Navy might not be somewhat reduced. In obedience to that command of this honorable House, the committee of the House charged with making that inquiry have reported to this House what they believed may be adopted as the just pay for officers of the Navy.

No gentleman on the other side of the House has a higher regard for the American Navy than I have. No gentleman on the other side of the House has a higher regard for the honor of the Army of the United States than I have. But highly as I regard the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] highly as I regard the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] my estimate of those gentlemen would be somewhat increased if I could be assured that in the dark and perilous hours of this country, when the men whom they have lauded, and so zealously lauded, stood up to vindicate the integrity of this Government at the cannon's mouth, they themselves in that hour gave aid and comfort to them by their personal service in the field.

They get up here now and profess to be the only champions of the Army and of the Navy; they profess to be the only respecters in this Hall of patriotism. Sir, true patriotism does not require prosperity for its growth, does not grow only in sunshine. It is a plant that grows in the noisome pestilence of the dungeon and holds companionship with chains. Show me the man who when the herald sounded for the champion periled life, liberty, and property, and all he had for the defense of his country, and I will show you a man whose patriotism is without discount.

Do gentlemen mean to assert that an Admiral of the United States Navy cannot render as much service to the Government on a salary of $10,000 a year as he would on a salary of $13,000? His salary will be above that of the Vice-President of the United States, above that of the Chief Justice or any of his associates on the supreme bench, men who labor like dray-horses from one end of the year to the other. We propose only to reduce the salary of an Admiral of the Navy from $13,000 to $10,000 a year.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] speaks of the number of rear-admirals being reduced from twelve to three. The corresponding rank in the Army is that of major-general, and there are but three major-generals in the Army, and they command 25,000 men. Why should we have on the active-list of the Navy twelve rear-admirals and on the retired-list thirty-eight rear-admirals?

The gentleman speaks of stopping promotion in the Navy. Why not? Promotion now is so rapid that officers rush up to the top of the ladder, and then get out of the way of others by retiring on the highest ranks, such as commodores, rear-admirals, &c.

The American Navy started before the American Government was formed, and the commander-in-chief of that Navy received for his salary but $1,200 a year. Sir, when Paul Jones was a second lieutenant in the Navy, be it said to his honor, with many other things that may be said to the honor of that gallant officer, he never hung around the halls of Congress begging to be raised in his rank or his pay. He won his position on the deck of his vessel not by hanging around Congress and demanding it as a political question.

So, sir, we have conformed a number of officers next to the rank of rear-admiral—the commodores—to brigadier-generals in the Army. Why should there be twenty-five of these officers in our Navy to eighty-five hundred men when we have only six brigadier-generals in our Army of 25,000 men? Has the Army done nothing to entitle it to the gratitude of the House or of gentlemen on the other side of the House? Yet when the bill was up reducing the number and pay of the Army we heard none of these bugle-notes that we now hear on the other side in the interest of the Navy.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. HALE. Will my colleague on the committee allow me just two minutes? He will remember that I occupied no time in the general debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it but right that I should yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, I am pretty generally in favor of economy and retrenchment, but I have before now been at issue with certain gentlemen on this floor as to the people's demand for certain measures of economy and retrenchment. To-day I find myself at issue with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who told me when he was last up that in his demand for reduction of expenditures, including the Army, he represented my people as well as his own. It is not for me to say whether he represents my people in Maine better than I do; but I have the record on him as to Ohio, and I propose to read it for his benefit, for he could not have made the speech he did if he had read the platform of the Ohio democracy.

There was a certain convention in Cincinnati a few days ago; and most of us, except the gentleman from Ohio, watched its proceedings and read its resolutions. We also read the resolutions which that convention voted down; and I want to read for the gentleman's benefit an extract from the majority report to that Ohio democratic convention.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. HALE. I cannot yield.

In one of those resolutions it is declared:

Resolved, That we thank the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States for its efforts in the reduction of public expenditures, reducing them, as is proposed, nearly $40,000,000.

When I read that I looked for its adoption; but I found further on that the reading of the report was followed by considerable confusion, and finally under the previous question the vote was taken upon the report of the minority as a substitute for the majority report from which I have read; and the minority report was adopted by a vote of 368 yeas to about 300 nays. In looking over the report which was adopted I fail to see a single word commendatory of this frantic effort to strike down expenditures whether right or wrong. The gentleman is therefore driven to one of two conclusions: either that convention did not represent the voice of the people of Ohio, or if it did it snubbed the gentleman from Cincinnati and other gentlemen of as large experience here and elsewhere in their efforts at economy.

Mr. BANNING. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question.

Mr. MILLS. In order to give the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] an opportunity to continue the debate, I withdraw my amendment that he may renew it.

Mr. BANNING. I renew the amendment. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine which one of those reports he adopts.

Mr. HALE. I have never seen in the proceedings of any democratic convention any set of resolutions, majority or minority, that I would adopt.

Mr. BANNING. That is the fact. The gentleman has told the truth. He never did see anything in any democratic platform that he would indorse.

The gentleman would not indorse that democractic majority that turned his party out of power because of the waste and extravagance of the public money of which they have been guilty. And to-day, instead of standing here as he should, laboring for such legislation as is in the interest of the people, he stands here to speak upon politics; and when a committee of this House reports a measure having economy for its object, he stands here to hurl back into their teeth the charge that the American people do not want from them any reduction of Army expenditures.

Mr. HALE. Now let me ask you a question.

Mr. BANNING. No, sir.

Mr. HALE. I let you put a question to me.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman's "true inwardness" has come out; it is fully developed. His opposition to this measure of economy is not that the country does not demand it; but because, forsooth, some of those who bring it in here were serving in the confederate army, while the gentleman was not serving in the Union Army, he hurls into their teeth the statement that the country does not want them to reduce the expenses of the Army or the Navy.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BANNING. Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope I will not be interrupted again. I say this is cheap work. The country does not object to reducing the naval officers as this bill proposes or to reducing the pay of Army officers. It does not object to the reduction of the pay of a brigadier-general to $5,000, of a major-general to $6,000, of a Lieutenant-General to $8,000, and of the General of the Army to $10,000. Even that reduction puts them on a better footing than the honorable gentleman from Maine, who comes here to represent his constituents at a salary of $5,000 a year. It gives them more than he receives. Now would his constituents consider these officers more valuable to the country than their Representative?

Are these officers more valuable to the country than Cabinet officers? I say, the country and the people will say that these salaries are large enough.

The gentleman from Maine cannot name, as he undertook to do, a single man who will resign and not take the salaries. He need not attempt to get away from telling this House that these men fight for money; that we give them those large salaries because they earned them in the war. Let me ask him did we pay the million of soldiers who carried knapsacks $16 a month because they earned it by their heroism, and no more? Was that the reason we did it? Did they fight only for that amount of money? The gentleman told us we could not make these men knights and lords and great people, and therefore we paid them this money. I repudiate all such sayings in the name of the Navy and in the name of the Army. It is a shame that an American statesman, an American Congressman should make known to Europe and the world that in America we pay our soldiers for their blood with money. Thank God, no man on this side of the House thinks that, not one of them.

My colleague laughs; he knows that it is not so. Every man who concedes that it is right and proper to pay to the civil officer, and to the officers in the Army or the Navy, and in fact to all the officers of the Government, only a fair, just, and reasonable salary must come to the conclusion that the salaries provided are sufficient and that the present distressed condition of the country will not justify us in giving more.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE. Now will the gentleman answer me one question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DE BOLT. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes allowed me I desire to say a word or two in regard to a matter that needs correction. In the State of Florida the Government owns large reservations of live-oak and cedar lands, the timber on which is intended for use solely for ship-building and naval purposes.

For the protection of this timber and to prevent its being wantonly destroyed and carried away the naval authorities from time to time appoint agents for the ostensible purpose of guarding the same.

To show how faithfully these agents perform their duties, how sacredly they guard the interests of the Government against trespassers and evil-doers, I desire to introduce and read portions of testimony taken before one of the committees of this House.

B. F. Livingston testifies:

By the Chairman, R. A. DE BOLT:

Question. Are you a timber agent in Florida?
Answer. I am; was appointed first in 1872.
Q. Are you a timber agent now?
A. I am.
Q. How far do you live from the timber?
A. I do not know, sir.
Q. Do you know where the timber is?
A. No, sir; I do not know where it is.
Q. What duties have you performed as such agent?
A. Nothing, sir, but draw my pay.

Henry Clews, witness:

Question. Are you a timber agent in Florida?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. How far do you live from the timber you are expected to guard?
A. I do not know anything about the public domains and did not try to find out.
Q. Did you ever see or visit the timber?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you perform any service under that appointment?
A. No, sir; nothing but draw my pay.
Q. What was your salary?
A. Forty-one dollars a month.
Q. What is the politics of these agents.
A. They are republicans.

ISADORE BLOOMENTHALL, collector at Cedar Keys:

Question. Do you know anything in regard to the appointment of timber agents in Florida?
Answer. I do. I know them all.
Q. How many are there?
A. Ten or twelve.
Q. Name one.
A. Arthur Sinclair.
Q. What is his salary?
A. One thousand dollars a year, I think.
Q. How near to the timber he is expected to guard does he live?
A. About fifty miles.
Q. What is his occupation?
A. Politician and preacher.

[Laughter.]

Q. How often does he visit the timber?
A. I think it will be conceded on all sides that the timber agencies in Florida are political positions and sinecures. I know they do not visit the timber. I do not think they are expected to do anything.
Q. You do not think they do any work?
A. I know it. It is not expected of them. They simply draw their pay, $40 a month, and nothing to do.
Q. When were these timber agents appointed?
A. In 1872, I think.
Q. What is your politics?
A. Republican.

Other witnesses testify to the same facts.

Thus it will be seen how securely the Government can rest under the watchful care of these ever-faithful guardians of her interests, confidently believing and feeling that all is well. For the past ten years this thing has been going on. The appropriation for the pay of these unnecessary and worthless appendages being $5,000 per annum.

There are at this time ten or twelve of these agents drawing salaries all the way from $40 per month up to $1,000 per year, none of whom reside within fifty miles of the timber and some as far as one hundred and fifty miles distant; not one of whom has ever visited those reservations; and they admit that they do not even know where they are. They have nothing to do; in fact they are in some cases notified at the time of their appointment that they will have nothing to do but the arduous task of drawing their salaries.

They are given no directions; there are no duties assigned them, no reports required of them, no inquiries made of them, nothing expected of them.

They are selected from all grades and classes: one is a barber, another a preacher, others are farmers, a number are gentlemen of leisure, while all are politicians. The latter qualification seems to be the only necessary prerequisite for a first-class timber agent.

"Political positions and sinecures," say the witnesses. Rather expensive luxuries, and it seems to me that the Government could possibly exist and its timber be just as safely cared for without them.

Mr. Chairman, the country is burdened with debt, oppressed with taxation; business of all kinds languishes; the agricultural, mechanical, and mining interests are depressed; the cries of financial distress come up from all parts of the country. Sir, with these facts staring us in the face it becomes us as the guardians of the public interests and as legislators to curtail the expenditures of the Government to the lowest possible limit that it can be done without injury to a judicious administration of its affairs and the well-being of the people; to lop off all sinecures, discharge all useless attachés that like leeches are sucking the very life-blood of the nation; stop all extravagance, and honestly apply the money drawn from the people by taxation to the payment of our public debt.

This, sir, is our duty. We owe it to our constituents, we owe it to our country; let us perform it fearlessly. I hope no more money will be appropriated for the benefit of these agents.

Mr. DANFORD. I ask my colleague to withdraw his amendment and I will renew it.

Mr. BANNING. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DANFORD. I renew it. I have no doubt the gentleman's facts are exceedingly interesting, but they have nothing to do with the proposition before this committee. This is a proposition about which I feel earnestly, and that the committee should vote on it understandingly. I take no part whatever in the political phase of this discussion. I feel sometimes thankful that I do not represent a constituency upon this floor that either have an interest in a navy-yard or for whose loyalty or patriotism I have any occasion to apologize.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the correction of the figures I used in my remarks a few moments ago, made by the chairman of the committee. The chairman is mistaken in the correction he makes. The furlough pay of a naval officer is one-half of his pay when waiting orders. The pay of a captain when waiting orders is $2,177.91, and one-half of that is $1,088.96.

And now, sir, in regard to the remarks made by gentlemen on the other side of the House that there is no need for the pay of an officer of the Navy being greater than the pay of a member of Congress or the pay of officers occupying positions of equal responsibility in civil life. Let me say, in response to that, we have the fact that an officer in the Navy practically has no home. He is subject to orders every day and every hour that he lives. When he is abroad on his ship his family are at home without his care and attention. And we all know that, circumstanced as he is, he requires, in order to make both ends meet in life, a larger pay than if he had a fixed home. A man who is required to live one year in the city of Washington, the next in the city of Norfolk, and after a few months' service there is ordered perhaps to the coast of Maine, having to break up his housekeeping arrangements, and moving hundreds and sometimes thousands of miles every two or three years, is at an expense to which no man in civil life is subjected.

I do not belive that the pay of the officers of the Navy as fixed by law as it now exists is greater than it should be. If I did so believe, I should not oppose the amendment offered by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, in response to the remarks of my colleague upon the committee about the different grades of pay in the Navy, I desire to say that this is not an idea originating with the Committee on Naval Affairs by any means. We have simply been following the line of precedent that has been established for many long years. The pay of the Navy has been graded into different classes, sea-pay being the highest because it is for the hardest duty; then shore pay, waiting orders, furlough, &c.

Now, I will say to my colleague, or to any gentleman who may oppose the reduction in pay on account of this grading, that for myself I have no objection to making but one kind of pay in the Navy; and let that be the sea pay, the highest. I have been in favor of that all the time. An objection to this is that if the Secretary of the Navy becomes offended with an officer he can order him to sea 20,000 miles off. If he has the same pay on sea as on shore and an officer in the navy-yard at Washington is so unfortunate as to incur the displeasure of the Secretary of the Navy, he might order him to report for duty to the Asiatic squadron or the South Sea squadron, or somewhere else on the other side of the earth. And in order to prevent him from punishing those who may have incurred his displeasure or from rewarding favorites of his own, the pay has for a long time been graded, so that if his favorite comes on shore he may come at the price of a lower pay. It is simply a check.

I think, sir, the Government ought to adopt some other check, and that the pay of all officers of the same grade should remain at the same figures. I think the Secretary of the Navy, or the Admiral, or any other superior officer, who to gratify some personal pique should prostitute the naval service by sending an officer to the other side of the earth is unworthy to be an officer of the American Navy and wear its sword or draw it in vindication of its flag. I think the law ought to apply some remedy by which that authority shall be restrained and so that a junior officer shall be protected against its arbitrary exercise. And if the gentleman shall offer to amend his bill by striking out the following provision, I shall vote with him:

> And when any of the officers hereinbefore mentioned, except the Admiral, Vice-Admiral, and naval constructors and assistant naval constructors, shall be on shore duty or on leave or waiting orders, their pay shall be reduced from the rates herein fixed in the same proportion as it is reduced from sea pay by existing law.

Mr. DANFORD. Does the gentleman from Texas propose to strike that out?

Mr. MILLS. There is an amendment now pending. But if at the proper time the gentleman will propose to strike that out I will go with him.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that debate on the pending amendment shall now close.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman, inasmuch as he is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I have not thus far participated in this debate, because I believed other gentlemen more familiar with the subject than I am would discuss it more to the edification and instruction of the House. But, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a fact which is of course well understood, but it is proper that I should call the attention of the House to it, that we are dealing now in this summary manner with one of the most important branches of the public service.

It is the mission, at least it is claimed to be the mission, of the majority of this House to strike at public abuses. So far as the people demand of this House the cutting down of extravagant expenditures and the reduction generally of the expenses of the Government, I certainly shall interpose no objection. But, Mr. Chairman, when and where has the demand been made upon this Congress that the Army or Navy should be reduced in the manner now proposed? Where has come the call upon this House to strike—and when I use the word strike I use it in no improper spirit and in no offensive sense—where has come the demand to strike at the Admiral of our Navy, and knock from his salary $3,000 a year; where has come the demand to strike at the Vice-Admiral, at the commanders and commodores?

I submit that he has heard no such call. But as we are dealing with this important branch of the service, I trust that no member of the House is willing to deal with it without full and complete understanding. Now, the House Committee on Naval Affairs ought not to have too much credit for knowledge upon this subject. I desire to enter my protest against any claim made by any member of the Committee on Naval Affairs that he understands the subject fully.

Now, look at our committee; there is only one gentleman upon it who has had any considerable experience in maritime affairs, and that is the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH.] In the main we have a committee composed of landsmen, and only within a week past have we been called upon to discuss this question; members of the committee have considered it in private. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has given it his patient attention, but I submit to him that the whole subject of the Navy is not within his grasp; and when he rises to-day and asks twice in one hour to amend an amendment from his own hands, it is evident that he is not competent to pass upon the entire subject. I ask gentlemen on the other side of the House to consider whether this matter is sufficiently matured to justify them in adopting this measure.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to remark that I did not suppose that my bill was perfect or that it could pass the House without amendment. All legislation is a compromise, and when other gentlemen are desirous of submitting amendments I shall be willing to hear them, and perhaps may be convinced by their argument.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I only ask the House to consider the question whether upon a discussion sprung upon the House so recently and upon a proposition so new and affecting so radically the organization of the Government, we should act upon it so hastily. It has been proposed in one committee that a board of naval officers shall be organized as a board of admiralty or otherwise to investigate and report to a future Congress——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise, with the view of limiting debate upon the amendment to one minute.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman refer to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE?]

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; and the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to that amendment.

Mr. DANFORD. Does the gentleman mean the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly; and the amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is that the committee rise, for the purpose of limiting the debate on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment to one minute.

Mr. PAGE. Cannot that be done in committee by unanimous consent?

Mr. BLOUNT. If there is no objection, I do not wish the committee to rise.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman seeks to close debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee I think a few minutes more of debate ought to be allowed. There is another clause in that amendment which has not been discussed at all.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will be glad to accommodate the gentleman, but there is a feeling here that debate ought to close, and I insist on my motion.

The question was taken on Mr. BLOUNT's motion; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. WHITTHORNE having taken the chair, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the naval bill, and pending that motion I move that all debate upon that pending amendment and the amendment thereto close in one minute.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman mean to include the entire amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE?]

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask him for five minutes, not to make any political remarks, but to discuss a matter of practice.

Mr. BLOUNT. I accept the modification, and move that all debate be limited to five minutes. I should like to know the wish of the House in regard to whether they would prefer to continue the consideration of this bill until six o'clock or to have a night session.

Mr. PAGE. Let us have a recess.

Mr. RUSK. O, no; you will do more business in one hour now than you will during the whole night session.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I will insist upon my motion to close debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. KASSON. With the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] if the gentleman's amendment is to be adopted, the proposition is meritorious in so far as it provides for longevity pay. If it is not adopted, I am satisfied that the provision would discourage officers of the Navy from continuing in the service, and there is some danger of accomplishing that result even if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas be adopted. But I wish especially to call the attention of the committee, without further passing upon the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee here, that it had better be treated as a general bill for the consideration of the House.

In the case of the Army-pay bill—and I regret that I was not here at the time it was under consideration—the bill was not attached to an appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations declined to attach this to their bill. If the Committee on Naval Affairs were disposed to treat it as a separate bill, giving us time to ascertain the opinions of officers of the Navy and of the Navy Department in regard to the effect of the proposed reduction, we would then be prepared to act. But the difficulty is that while gentlemen speak of the reduction of the pay of certain officers that is but a small part of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] That amendment goes to the reduction of the entire Navy in the future, and of course connected with that is the question of how many ships we can have, whether we shall build any more, and all other questions relating to the prosperity and the very existence of our Navy.

I do not believe that the gentlemen of the majority of this House desire, on such short consideration, to attach an amendment of this importance to an appropriation bill. If they choose to go on and consider it now, of course it is in the power of the majority to do so. But I myself feel totally unqualified to vote upon the propriety of all the enormous reductions proposed to be made permanently in the force of the Navy. I would therefore ask, as debate is about to be closed upon this proposition, that, even if the majority approve a great part of it, they will not attach it to an appropriation bill and force both sides of this House to vote without the opinions of the men who, we must admit, are alone competent to pass upon the question of the complete organization of the Navy which is involved in this amendment, together with the number of ships in the Navy, and all other questions of that kind.

On the question of prize-money as an offset to the longevity pay of the Army, allow me to say that only about one officer of the Navy in a hundred during the late war received any prize-money. Only those obtained prize-money who were on outside stations and had the fortune to be moving in the track of the commerce of the enemy. Therefore that cannot be considered an equivalent to longevity pay, which affects all the officers of the Army.

In view of the limited time allowed for debate, I believe this is all I can say in regard to the adoption of this amendment. It is not that it strikes at the salaries of a few officers of the Navy, but it strikes at the entire Navy in respect to its force. I hope, whatever the opinion of the House may be, that they will not attach this to the appropriation bill, but leave it for consideration as a separate measure under the management of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the House for debate upon the pending amendment has expired.

The question was taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. MILLS to the amendment moved by Mr. WHITTHORNE; and it was agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by striking out the following:

And the pay of all other officers on the active-list of the Navy shall remain as it is now provided by law; and when any of the officers hereinbefore mentioned, except the Admiral, Vice-Admiral, and naval constructors and assistant naval constructors, shall be on shore duty or on leave or waiting orders, their pay shall be reduced from the rates herein fixed in the same proportion as it is reduced from sea pay by existing law.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That would leave those officers to receive the pay they now receive by law.

Mr. HALE. Exactly; it does not affect the rate of their shore pay or their leave pay.

Mr. MILLS. The first part of the amendment submitted by the Committee on Naval Affairs provides "that from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, the officers of the Navy shall receive the following pay," &c. If the paragraph is stricken out, as moved by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] what will become of the officers named in it?

Mr. HALE. I think the specification in the first part of the amendment would apply only to the officers named in the amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest to the gentleman to leave the first part of the paragraph—"and the pay of all other officers on the active-list of the Navy shall remain as it is now provided by law."

Mr. HALE. I will agree to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] and move to strike out the paragraph I have indicated, except the first clause which he has read, and the amendment to it which was adopted on his motion.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE; and it was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I move to further amend the amendment by striking out the words "and no promotion or appointment shall be made to the grades of medical director and medical inspector and pay director and pay inspector and assistant naval constructor and civil engineer," and to insert in lieu thereof that which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And no promotion shall be made to the grade of medical director until their number shall be reduced below one; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of medical inspector until their number shall be reduced below six; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of pay director until their number shall be reduced below one; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of pay inspector until their number shall be reduced below five; and there shall be no promotion to the grades of assistant naval constructor and civil engineer.

Mr. MILLS. In the amendment submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] it will be observed that the two grades of medical director and medical inspector——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate upon the pending amendment has been closed by order of the House.

Mr. MILLS. I did not so understand the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Such was the order of the House, and, while the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs is open to amendment, it is not open to further debate.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee rise, in order that debate may be had upon amendments as proposed. I think this is a matter of too much importance to be considered without debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the motion that the committee rise will not be agreed to. If the gentleman thinks this matter has not been fully debated, let him bring it before the House in some other way.

Mr. DANFORD. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion that the committee rise is not debatable.

The question was then taken upon the motion that the committee rise; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment moved by Mr. MILLS, and being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out in the last paragraph of the amendment the following clause:

All officers of the volunteer service of the Navy shall be discharged from service after the 1st of July, 1876; and laws authorizing the appointment or employment by the Secretary of the Navy of any person in the volunteer Navy shall be, and are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was agreed to; there being ayes 82, noes not counted.

Mr. EAMES. I move to amend by striking out the entire paragraph beginning with the words "And after the passage of this act."

Mr. HALE. That the House may understand the effect of the amendment, I ask that the paragraph proposed to be struck out be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And after the passage of this act, there shall be no promotion to the grade of rear-admiral until their number shall be reduced below three; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of commodore until their number shall be reduced below six; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of captain until their number shall be reduced below forty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of commander until their number shall be reduced below fifty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of lieutenant-commander until their number shall be reduced below sixty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of lieutenant until their number shall be reduced below one hundred and fifty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of chief engineer until their number shall be reduced below forty; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of passed assistant engineer until their number shall be reduced below seventy-three; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of assistant engineer until their number shall be reduced below forty-seven; and no promotion or appointment shall be made to the grades of medical director and medical inspector and pay director and pay inspector and assistant naval constructor and civil engineer; and no promotion shall be made to the grade of paymaster until their number shall be reduced below twenty-five; and no promotion to the grade of naval constructor until their number shall be reduced below six: Provided, That in case of war said Secretary of the Navy may appoint or employ assistant surgeons as now authorized by law: And provided further, That all civil engineers now in the naval service shall be discharged on the 1st day of July, 1876.

The question being taken on agreeing to Mr. EAMES's amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 57, noes 71.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. WHITTHORNE as amended. The question being taken, there were—ayes 61, noes 65; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. HALE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 74.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to amend the pending paragraph—upon which I understand debate has not been closed—by striking out in line 17 the word "seven," and inserting "eight;" so as to make the entire force of the Navy eighty-five hundred men.

The proposed reduction of our naval force from eighty-five hundred men to seventy-five hundred would necessitate a reduction of the ships in commission. It would be necessary to take out of commission and lay up a portion of our Navy at present in commission. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] said on Saturday last that the Secretary of the Navy, by keeping vessels at the navy-yards upon the Atlantic coast, could when notified by telegraph immediately order one or more naval vessels to the most distant portions of the earth. That perhaps would be true if the vessels were in commission; but a ship out of commission, a ship that has neither officers nor men on board, cannot be sent out of port in answer to a telegraphic summons either a long or a short distance. You cannot improvise a naval force in a few days or a few weeks. You may put the men in line, you may officer them, you may send them against an enemy; but a vessel lying at one of your navy-yards, without officers or men on board, would, if hastily sent out, be only the prey of the enemy.

If you discharge from the Navy a thousand men who are now enlisted and serving in it they would seek service elsewhere; they would not remain about our navy-yards or upon our coasts awaiting service; they would take service in the merchant marine; they would go abroad; and when you want a thousand men in order to put into commission five or ten vessels in an emergency, you would be compelled to man them with raw men, men who could not handle a ship and who would only be food for powder. There is wisdom in the policy recommended by the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting: to keep in commission our monitors, even though they have but half their complement of men; so that, if we should have trouble near our borders, (and it is just here in the Gulf that we are likely to have trouble with an enemy,) if we should have at any time trouble upon the sea, these monitors can in a short time reach the scene of action. Each of those monitors having fifty men—one-half the complement—fifty new men cannot be put upon them without coming in contact with those drilled and disciplined sailors, and thus they could speedily learn to manage the vessel. In our improvised Army in 1861, entire regiments were sometimes composed of raw men, and it was difficult to handle them; but when those regiments had had four or five years' service, you might fill their rank to the extent of one-third or one-half with raw recruits who would at once fall in line, and the regiment could be as easily handled as though composed entirely of veterans.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. In consequence of the vote which the House has recently given refusing to adopt the amendments of the Committee on Naval Affairs, it becomes necessary to reconsider the vote given on Saturday reducing the total amount for the pay of the Navy from $6,250,000 down to $5,750,000 in order to restore the half million dollars taken off on Saturday. In contemplation of that amendment being adopted as a measure of the majority of the House I suppose the Committee on Appropriations made the reduction they presented to the bill on Saturday and it was sustained by the House. I know some of the Committee on Naval Affairs were consulted as to the propriety of making that reduction. I know the views of the Committee on Naval Affairs, or of some of its members, were given that in consideration of this amendment being adopted a further reduction could be made. I am satisfied the reduction of half a million dollars, as the bill now stands, will not furnish the pay of the Navy as provided for by law.

Mr. RANDALL. We cannot go back.

Mr. MILLS. I voted with the majority and can move to reconsider.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider is not in order in the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I regret very much the gentleman from Texas, as well as the gentleman from Ohio, has seen fit to endeavor to re-instate the bill as it was, fixing a larger amount for the pay of the Navy than has been agreed upon. I say to this House I have taken up as much time as I desire on the subject. I know too much debate is tedious; that too much debate is useless. I have carefully for weeks considered this matter of the pay of the Navy. When I determined upon that amendment and when those members of the Committee on Appropriations who agreed with me in the reduction I offered determined upon it, we had not in contemplation the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLS. Then why did the committee report $6,250,000 to the House?

Mr. BLOUNT. I can answer the gentleman with pleasure that when I found out I had made a mistake in that, (which I have had fully explained to the House,) I deemed it only right and proper to correct it and ask the House to correct it. The appropriation is now entirely correct. It is ample and complete, and if I were to do anything I would strike it down more. I say we knew what we were doing when we did it.

Mr. RANDALL. I move pro forma to increase the appropriation for the purpose of saying that the reduction from $6,250,000 to $5,750,000 had no reference to the amendment of the Naval Committee, but was the result of further information coming from the Navy Department. I admit if a thousand more men are to be added then there will be necessity for an increased amount—not in connection with the pay of officers, but the pay of the men. The number was reduced to seventy-five hundred advisedly, on the belief that seventy-five hundred men were enough to man all the vessels which would be in commisison in the Navy during the coming fiscal year. Therefore, if the number of men shall remain at seventy-five hundred there is no occasion whatever to increase the amount from $5,750,000.

Mr. MILLS. What is the necessity of reducing the number of men and increasing the number of officers? There is now about one officer to every four men in the Navy. The Committee on Appropriations have reported to this House a reduction in the strength of the Navy of a thousand men, while they still leave the same number of officers with a provision for the rapid increase of officers, so I suppose in ten or twelve months there will be one officer to every three men.

Mr. RANDALL. We keep up the number of officers as the skeleton of what may be necessary. The gentleman must not find fault because the House did not agree with him. I do not wish to fight that battle over again. We have not seen fit in the Appropriation Committee to reduce the number of officers, while we thought the number of men could be reduced without injury. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DANFORD'S amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the civil establishment at the navy-yards at Brooklyn, New York; League Island, Pennsylvania; Norfolk, Virginia; and Mare Island, California, $80,000; and for the protection and care of the navy-yards not enumerated, $5,000. And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to make inquiry as to the best method of making sale of the navy-yards at Charlestown, Washington, and Pensacola, and shall report the same to the next session of this Congress at its commencement; and he shall also take measures toward the recession of the naval station at New London, and report thereon at the same time; and he is further directed to establish a naval rendezvous at Tybee Island or at Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia, and to make available any Government property at said islands suitable for such purpose.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My friend from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] has an amendment to offer from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LEWIS. I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3 strike out all from the beginning of line 43 to the word "commencement" inclusive in line 51, and insert the following:

That the navy-yards at Brooklyn, Kittery, Charlestown, and Norfolk be retained for general purposes; and those at Pensacola and Mare Island be retained as naval rendezvouses, and for temporary repairs; and the yard at Washington be used only for manufacturing purposes under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy; and the yards at League Island and New London be abandoned, and the property thereto appertaining, where the same cannot be utilized or removed without too great expense, be sold, and the proceeds turned into the Treasury; and for the civil establishment at the foregoing yards, —— thousand dollars.

Mr. KELLEY. I make the point of order that this is new legislation not in the line of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point on the paragraph of the bill or the amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. On the amendment I make two points: First, that it is new legislation not provided by law, contravening existing laws, and not in the line of economy; and, secondly, it is a proposition to ingraft one bill upon another, the amendment being a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to submit an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his amendment for the present.

Mr. LEWIS. I prefer to have my amendment remain pending as it is.

Mr. MILLS. Then I make the point of order that the provision in the appropriation bill is not germane, as it provides for the abolition of navy-yards of the United States, which was not a subject referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order under the new rule as it has been construed at this session.

Mr. MILLS. I make the further point that this provision in the appropriation bill in relation to navy-yards is new legislation, and not in the line of reduction of expenditures. It does not appear upon the face of the bill, the only authority that the Chair can consult in deciding upon the question, that it is any reduction of expenditures. It can be no reduction of expenditures to give away navy-yards; and it does not appear affirmatively on the face of the bill that there is any saving to the public Treasury by what is here proposed in the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think that it appears on the face of this bill that we are giving away navy-yards.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to sustain the point of order at the present stage as made by the gentleman from Texas. The Chair conceives that it is within the power of the committee, even if the paragraph should not be strictly in order, so to amend the proposition as to make it in accordance with the rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] will now be read.

Mr. LEWIS'S amendment was read.

Mr. KELLEY. I raise the point of order that this is an attempt to ingraft a new bill on the bill under consideration. It is an attempt to ingraft on this bill the bill (H. R. No. 3474) which was presented to the House, read twice on May 17, 1876, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and reported back from that committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman from Alabama offer the whole of that bill as an amendment?

Mr. KELLEY. Then I add the further objection that it is new legislation, not in pursuance of existing law, and not in the line of economy.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And not germane to the bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I understood the Speaker, in making the first ruling on this question, to take the ground that it must appear affirmatively that the proposition was germane and tended to economy; that the first point was one that might be decided from the phraseology of the bill; that the second was one that must appear affirmatively in the bill or must be a consequence beyond dispute. Now I affirm that this is not germane to the bill, and that it is not in the line of economy.

Recurring to what I said the other evening as to the reasons for the establishment of a naval station at League Island and to the remarks I quoted from the then Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Gideon Welles, I find that League Island was first sought for and then established as a naval station for the purposes of economy; that a time had come in the history of naval warfare when if the United States were to hold place among commercial and naval powers they must have iron vessels of the immense proportions in which they are constructed by other nations to bear such weighty armaments as are provided by other governments; and that this could not be done with certainty, with celerity, or with economy while our dependence was on the private workshops of the country; that there was no other customer for such work than the Government; that the preparation of such material required large accumulations of machinery and material, and that efficiency and economy—these were the words of the then Secretary of the Navy—required such an establishment on fresh water, in easy connection with the coal and iron fields, and with the masses of skilled workmen in metals; and that these conveniences were found in a higher degree at the confluence of the Delaware and the Schuykill, in Pennsylvania, than at any other point along the Atlantic coast. Therefore the inducement to acquire League Island was essentially and primarily economy.

The Secretary asserted and re-affirmed from time to time that we did not, in his judgment, need an additional yard; that the essential want of the Navy was a yard of entirely different characteristics from any then existing; one with different relations from any then existing; one, as I have said, on fresh water and in easy connection with the great iron and coal fields and the great workshops which use machine-tools and are able to handle greater masses of metal; so that, to use his own language, for the not inconsiderable portions of vessels and armaments that might be procured from private shops, of easy access, there would be many private shops offering, if the Government needed such work; but for those heavier branches, both of ship-building and of armament, for which there was no other demand than that of the Government's, there must be Government workshops, dependent upon the supply of fuel and raw material.

Now, sir, this bill proposes to retrocede League Island. It is the only station upon fresh water. It is the only station connected with the great coal and iron fields, and the great machine-shops, forges, and furnaces of the country. The railroads coming from Pittsburgh and from all the iron and coal fields of Pennsylvania, from those along the Delaware, and those along the Susquehanna, the Juniata, the Monongahela, and the Alleghany, not only all connect with League Island, but rails continuous from all these parts carry the cars right into League Island station. The Government has invested something more than a million of dollars on that island, and Philadelphia has re-imbursed the expenditure by purchasing from it the little yard of twenty acres, with a wharf-front too narrow to lay two vessels end to end in front thereof. And it would be a matter not of economy but of gross extravagance to sell at any price, much less to retrocede League Island navy-yard.

It is for the gentleman proposing this measure to show affirmatively that it is a measure of economy, and for that purpose, if he desires it, I will yield him the floor for a limited time, reserving my right to resume it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not understand that the gentleman has any control over the floor on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that, but I do not consent that the gentleman shall get the floor on a point of order and then farm it out.

Mr. LEWIS. The remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] seemed intended more as a speech in favor of League Island than on the point of order now before the committee. There is nothing in the proposed amendment which changes the existing law, unless the proposition to abandon League Island and New London may be so considered.

The first proposition of the amendment is to retain the Kittery, Charlestown, Brooklyn, and Norfolk navy-yards for general purposes. The law now retains them for general purposes. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to use the navy-yard at Washington for manufacturing purposes only. The Secretary of the Navy has that power. It also requires that the Pensacola and Mare Island yards shall be used as naval rendezvouses and for the purpose of repairs. Under the law as it now stands the Secretary of the Navy has the power to confine them to those purposes. So that there is no proposition in the amendment to change the existing law unless it is the proposition to abandon the League Island and New London yards. If that is a proposition to change existing law, which I do not admit, it is a proposition in the line of economy, because all the requirements for completing the navy-yards at New London and League Island will be dispensed with. The thirty or forty millions of dollars required to put up a new navy-yard at League Island according to the plans of the Navy Department will be dispensed with and the millions of dollars required to complete the navy-yard at New London will no longer be needed; and if the proposition brought forward by the Committee on Appropriations is in order, why then the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is also in order, because it does not change the existing law except where the Committee on Appropriations propose to change existing law as to the abandonment of League Island and New London.

As to the point that the bill is one already reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs and therefore cannot be attached to this bill, that point of order amounts to nothing, for we do not propose the bill as coming from the Naval Committee in the form agreed on by them, but only a part thereof; we take something from it and put something to it, and we change it radically; but I suppose that no gentleman upon this floor will consider that point as amounting to anything. The only point is whether the amendment changes existing law, and if it does, whether it is in the line of retrenchment. It is in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think that either of the gentlemen have stated clearly the point wherein this amendment will be considered out of order. In my judgment that is the point which proposes to abandon the League Island and New London navy-yards. Now, to abandon these stations would involve depriving the Government of the United States of both pieces of property under the existing law and contracts.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. You propose in your bill to abolish the New London navy-yard.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman had listened to my remarks the other day he would have seen that we found the difficulty, and I stated that by an amendment we would correct it.

Mr. LEWIS. But you propose further to authorize the President to sell the Pensacola and Washington yards.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman certainly does not want to misrepresent the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. Read that part of the bill and you will see that you instruct the Secretary of the Navy to take steps to the end that those yards may be sold.

Mr. RANDALL. To make inquiry only; we were very careful to avoid that objection. The amendment proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs if adopted takes from the Government the ownership of two valuable pieces of property.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me call the attention of the committee to one or two points, for I do not wish to take any lengthy part in this discussion. The Government of the United States through Congress accepted certain property from the city of Philadelphia valued at the time in round numbers at $500,000. Since the acceptance of that property Congress has made annually appropriations for the construction of the navy-yard at League Island amounting now to about $1,300,000. This proposed retrocession is not in the interest of economy, as the Government will absolutely be surrendering $1,800,000, the value of the property and the improvements made upon it at the Government expense. The condition of the acceptance was that a naval station should be established upon it, hence the Government can realize nothing from the retrocession, but must, if this amendment be in order and prevails, part with this immense amount of valuable property. This evidently cannot be construed as economy.

In reply to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] who seems to think the point raised upon ruling out that part of the amendment in relation to the New London and League Island navy-yards may be correct and their retrocession not be in the interest of economy, I will make the suggestion, and it seems forcible to me, that the Government may be bound in honor, on account of the condition of the acceptance, to continue their construction, or, at all events, to hold the land with the improvements, although Congress may not be obliged each year to make appropriations therefor. In other words, Congress can withhold the means of extending the improvements. Hence we have to-day no evidence that the retrocession of these two yards is in the interest of economy, because we cannot say what recommendation may come into the House from the Committee on Appropriations in the sundry civil appropriation bill for expenditures to be made upon these yards. That committee may not report any appropriation for either of them at this session or the next.

There is no question about the power of Congress to authorize the sale of Government property wherever it may be, provided it is owned by the Government absolutely and without condition; for instance, Congress authorized the sale of the old navy-yard at Philadelphia, and it was sold at public sale for $1,000,000. That amount was realized; and thus there was an equivalent in money for the property parted with. But the retrocession of any property given to the Government conditionally for any specified purpose, as for the purpose of establishing a navy-yard, is an absolute giving up of, as in the instance of League Island, hundreds of thousands of dollars, the value of the land, and hundreds of thousands of dollars more, the amount expended upon improvements. I think upon these points that this amendment is not in the interest of economy, and that the chairman cannot admit it for consideration upon this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Alabama, in assuming that this is a measure of retrenchment because it will save future appropriations, assumes the whole question involving this grave aspect or this distinct question, Shall we build and maintain iron vessels? For if we are to do so we must have a fresh-water station.

If you sell the improvements on League Island, the work of retrocession is an easy one, for the title rests on the fact that it is to be maintained as a naval station. You have put on that property a million of dollars in a ship-house, store-houses, and machine-shops.

This bill says, "And the yards at League Island and New London be abandoned, and such property thereto pertaining, where the same cannot be utilized or secured without too great expense, be sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury." The declaration that League Island is abandoned revests the title in Philadelphia. What will be the economy in organizing another naval commission to go out and seek another fresh-water station? What will be the economy in competing with speculators for a new site? What will be the economy in erecting on that new site such buildings as already exist on the site of League Island?

It is for the gentleman to establish affirmatively that this is a measure of economy in connection with the exigencies of the Government for an iron ship-building station. The honored Speaker of this House in deciding the point of order the other day said, in substance, that so far as the mere accomplishment of the thing proposed it appears to be in the line of retrenchment; but how does it appear that it will not involve a greater expense? I put that question to the gentleman; if you abandon League Island and thereby retrocede it, and sell for what you can get the materials in existing buildings there, how are you to proceed with the building of iron ships? That question must be answered before it can be made to appear affirmatively that there is a tendency to retrenchment in this amendment. I now leave the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to decide the points of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] The first is that this amendment proposes to incorporate a bill now pending with another, and is therefore amenable to the provision in the forty-eighth rule of the House, which is:

No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto or incorporating therewith any other bill or resolution pending before the House.

In a note to this rule it is observed:

The latter clause of the forty-eighth rule, as originally reported to the House, contained at the end of it, "nor by any proposition containing the substance, in whole or in part, of any other bill or resolution pending before the House." These words were sticken out by the House before it would agree to the rule, by which it would seem to have been decided that an amendment containing the substance of another bill or resolution may be entertained. [Such, too, has been the practice ever since.] It has been decided that an amendment including the same provisions, to a very great extent, as other bills pending before the House, is in order.

It will be observed that this amendment, as offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] while it is in part a bill (No. 3474) now pending before this House, nevertheless differs from that bill in this respect: the latter portion of the bill No. 3474 from and after the word "Treasury," in the twelfth line, has been stricken out. It is, therefore, not the same bill, although containing the "substance" of another bill. The Chair therefore holds that the first point of order is not well taken.

The second point of order is that this amendment is amenable to the objection that it is new legislation and does not "retrench expenditures." The objection is not raised, as it has been in other cases, that this amendment is not germane to the bill; that is admitted on all sides. Rule 120, as amended by the House at the beginning of this session, is as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

As was held by the Speaker of this House, the Chair may not go outside to search for other considerations to determine his decision upon this question; he must look to the force and specific terms of the proposed amendment, the law of the land so far as applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practice of this House. It appears clearly to the present occupant of the chair that if the navy-yards at League Island and New London are abandoned, then in the language of the rule such action would "retrench expenditures." It may be that valuable property will be abandoned by the Government; but this, even if it be the fact, can have no controlling influence in determining the decision of the point of order. The rule does not forbid the abandonment of property by legislative enactment, if such abandonment "shall retrench expenditures" in the future.

The Speaker of this House, in rendering his decision upon the first case which arose under the amended rule, made use of this language:

The inquiry then recurs, is this amendment such a one as by its own force and the other provisions of this bill retrenches expenditures? Does that appear? The Chair might answer, that to abolish an office is the retrenchment of expenditure; and if such abolition were begun and perfected by this bill, the Chair would have no hesitation in holding that such an abolition did accomplish a retrenchment of expenditure; there would then be no doubt on the point.

If the abolition of an office would, in the judgment of the Speaker of this House, be a retrenchment of expenditures, by parity of reasoning the abolition of two navy-yards, which is begun and perfected by this amendment, would certainly retrench expenditures. In that case the Speaker said considerately and after great deliberation:

It does not affirmatively appear upon the face of the bill or the laws of the land or the usual and customary mode of proceeding of this body that this section, if enacted in this bill, will retrench expenditures.

The objection to the section then under consideration was that it did not appear affirmatively to be a retrenchment of expenditures but that retrenchment might depend upon future legislation, that its effect was a matter of speculation and argument regarding which men might arrive at different conclusions.

It seems clear that this proposed amendment is free from any such doubt or ambiguity. It is manifest that if we abandon navy-yards, which, as we have official knowledge, require large appropriations for their support and efficiency, thereby dispensing with the services of Navy officers and of large numbers of employés, who may deny that in the very words of the rule it "shall retrench expenditures." To be in order an amendment must be "germane" to the bill, and it "shall retrench expenditures." No one questions that it is germane, and who will say that in the future expenditures will be required for navy-yards which have been abandoned? Therefore the Chair holds that this second point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not well taken.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLOUNT. With the consent of the gentleman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Union generally and particularly the naval appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOPKINS.]

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD COMBINATIONS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have the floor.

Mr. PAGE. The motion to adjourn, I believe, is always in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As soon as the gentleman is recognized the motion will be in order.

Mr. PAGE. I may not be recognized to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that certain of the leading railroads engaged in interstate commerce and in commerce from the inland States to the seaboard for exportation have combined for the purpose of controlling said traffic, and have made and continue to make unjust discriminations in the carrying of such freight, whereby many industries have been crippled and are threatened with extreme prostration; and whereas numerous petitions have been presented during the present session of Congress praying for the passage of an act to regulate such commerce and to prohibit such discrimination: Now, therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised of the truth and extent of such alleged combination and of the effects thereof, and of the most complete remedy therefor,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to investigate the allegations aforesaid, and report by bill or otherwise, with power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to this resolution?

Mr. KEHR. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is then on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HOPKINS. I did not suppose there would be any objection to the resolution. A few days ago I offered it in a somewhat different form, calling for the appointment of a select committee. At the instance of the gentleman who then objected to it I have modified the resolution so as to refer this inquiry to one of the regular committees. In this form I did not anticipate any objection.

Mr. FOSTER. There ought to be no objection.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, there were—ayes 50, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the House adjourn.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Pending the motion to adjourn, the following requests for withdrawal of papers were granted by unanimous consent:

Mr. O'BRIEN: Papers in the case of Elizabeth L. McCracken, being an application for a pension.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee: Papers in relation to the claim of H. B. Folk, of Brownsville, Tennessee, for reference to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. JOHN REILLY: Petition and papers of Annie F. Ball, being an application for a pension, no adverse report having been presented.

Mr. PAGE. I will withdraw the motion to adjourn if the demand for a quorum upon the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HOPKINS] be not insisted upon, so that the resolution may be adopted.

Mr. KEHR. I object.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I shall object to unanimous consent being given for a single thing during the remainder of this session unless this resolution be allowed to go through.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at six o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, South Carolina, in behalf of merchants and citizens of that city, remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, on account of a provision in the treaty for the admission of rice grown on those islands free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of April S. REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3093) for the relief of the legal representatives of Zachariah B. Washburn, deceased, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1253) granting to the State of Missouri all lands therein selected as swamp and overflowed lands, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 714) to aid in the construction of a military bridge across the North Platte River, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DORSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2962) to amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Joint Stock Company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," to report it without amendment; and I ask for the present consideration of the bill. I do not think it will lead to the slightest debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go over, for as soon as we have a quorum I think we ought to go on with the regular order. There will be no difficulty about getting up the bill to-morrow; but we should go to the regular order to-day as soon as possible.

Mr. DORSEY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 1034) for the relief of James G. Harrison, and the bill (S. No. 840) for the relief of Norman H. Ryan, asked to be discharged from their further consideration and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1336) to establish a new land district in the Territory of Wyoming, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the morning business is through——

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are going to have the regular order presently, and cannot pass any bills.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis, Kuner, Zisemann & Zott, Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio, to report it back with a slight amendment, and I have no doubt the Senate will concur in the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts ask for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 301) to provide for the appointment of clerks of the courts of the United States in the district of Indiana, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 362) prescribing an oath of office, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 240) relating to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. I am authorized by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of Edward O'M. Condon, to report it back with an amendment. This being a joint resolution suggesting the intercession of our Government in obtaining the pardon or release of Edward O'Meagher Condon, an American citizen imprisoned in an English prison, I will say in making this report that if it be the pleasure of the Senate at an early moment I shall ask that the joint resolution may be considered.

Mr. WRIGHT. If it is the intention of the Senate to proceed with the regular order I shall not insist upon the motion I was about to make; but if we are to proceed with legislative business, I claim the floor for the purpose of moving to take up a bill, if I can do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We ought to go on with the regular order. The court adjourned until twelve o'clock.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object. I ask the Senate to proceed according to its order.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to make an appeal for a moment to the Senator from Iowa, which I do not on my own suggestion merely, but on that of other Senators. I think no time would be consumed in acting upon the joint resolution which I have just reported touching Condon. The Senator will remember that petitions have come from many States in that regard. It is a House resolution. There is no amendment except a verbal one. If the Senator from Iowa will yield for that purpose, I ask the Senate to take up the resolution. I am sure it will lead to no debate, and can be disposed of at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has called for the regular order.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I make my appeal to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Senator would be kind enough to let this matter go over until to-morrow, for I wish to look at it a little.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not insist at all. It is the right of any Senator to require a measure just reported to lie over.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 862) to amend and construe section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to foreign patents; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

EARLY RESOLVES AND ORDINANCES.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and I will make a remark in explanation of its purpose.

I had occasion recently to examine the legislative resolves and ordinances of the Continental Congress and the Congress under the Confederation. I was astonished to learn that these resolves and ordinances had never been collected, and I could only find them in the Journals of Congress. I found the Journals to consist of thirteen volumes, which had been very imperfectly indexed, and there was an imperfect index for each volume; so that I was under the necessity of looking through every volume to find what I wanted. There has been a second edition of the Journals, that edition being in four volumes, but it is as defective as the first edition, and both editions are exceedingly scarce.

These resolves and ordinances are very important, as they reflect a light on subsequent legislation and on subjects that are constantly engaging the attention of Congress more or less. It seems to me it is very important that they should be collected. The object of the resolution I now introduce is to instruct the Committee on the Library to inquire into the expediency and propriety of collecting these resolves and ordinances and printing them in a proper form for use. I desire to have the resolution considered at once.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to; as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of collecting and printing in convenient form for use the legislative resolves and ordinances passed by the Continental Congress and the Congress of the Confederation, and report by bill or otherwise.

COST OF PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to the Senate a detailed estimate of the amount that would be required to execute House bill No. 2454 as reported with amendments from the Senate Committee on Pensions and now pending before the Senate.

The resolution merely calls for information as to the cost involved in certain legislation—the pension bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind the Senator from Ohio that the resolution does not contain the title of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The title is given by the number. It is a bill amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and for other purposes.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? [A pause.] Pursuant to order the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, (at five o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 23, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield to me for the purpose of introducing a bill for reference only.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. BLOUNT. The regular order of business being demanded, I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the pending question was on the following amendment, moved by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS.]

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3 strike out all from the beginning of line 43 to the word "commencement" inclusive in line 51, and insert the following:

That the navy-yards at Brooklyn, Kittery, Charlestown, and Norfolk be retained for general purposes; and those at Pensacola and Mare Island be retained as naval rendezvouses, and for temporary repairs; and the yard at Washington be used only for manufacturing purposes under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy; and the yards at League Island and New London be abandoned, and the property thereto appertaining, where the same cannot be utilized or removed without too great expense, be sold, and the proceeds turned into the Treasury; and for the civil establishment at the foregoing yards, —— thousand dollars.

Mr. PIPER. I rise to move an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, it is a subject of regret that it is almost impossible under the five-minute rule to give all the considerations which induced the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer this amendment to the naval appropriation bill, but we think the House is already in possession of sufficient reasons to justify the retention of the excellent navy-yards at Charlestown, Kittery, Brooklyn, and Norfolk for general purposes, and that they are convinced of the necessity of retaining at least one naval rendezvous on the Gulf of Mexico, that is, the navy-yard at Pensacola, for temporary repairs. We all admit the necessity of retaining the navy-yard at Mare Island, California, for the protection of our Pacific coast, and for the repairs of our Navy upon the waters of the Pacific. It is, then, only necessary for me to address myself to the two propositions of abandoning League Island and New London.

Every candid person who deals with this question must admit the many advantages which Philadelphia has as a naval station. The close proximity to the immense iron and coal resources of Pennsylvania, the excellent fresh-water front at League Island, the resources of labor, being the second city in the Union in population and the greatest city in point of manufacture, and, all things being equal, if we were starting out for the purpose of establishing navy-yards, doubtless Philadelphia would be selected as a point. But this House should not forget that Pennsylvania did have a navy-yard, that it had an excellent navy-yard embracing twenty-two acres in extent, with a splendid water front of eight hundred and twenty feet, and that when the city of Philadelphia desired to get rid of it that vast corporation, the Pennsylvania Railroad, laid covetous eyes on those twenty-two acres as well as the beautiful water front of eight hundred and twenty feet, and this country has witnessed within the last few months the disgraceful sight of seeing that property belonging to this Government sold to that corporation at the price of $1,000,000 when every man who is acquainted with the facts knows it is worth $6,000,000 and perhaps $10,000,000 to-day. You propose to sell navy-yards this day, to institute proceedings for selling Charlestown, closing Kittery, and selling Pensacola as well as the navy-yard at Washington with all its excellent machinery, purchased at an enormous price for the Government; and yet the machinery at the Philadelphia navy-yard lies there in one vast confusion and jumble, perfectly worthless to the Government. I want this House to consider whether it is proper, representing as we do the people of the United States, in their present financial distress, to begin the enterprise of building a new navy-yard in place of the old one at League Island, four miles from the city, away from conveniences for labor, with no means of occupancy except by grading and filling at enormous expense, with a depression of surface below high-water mark, subject to overflow at every high tide, and which could not be prevented except by the most costly system of dikes? Where are you to get a foundation for the heavy buildings planned, the vast machine-shops and heavy machinery, except by a system of piling, costly and expensive, over a vast area of four hundred and twenty acres?

Mr. PIPER. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the navy-yards of Brooklyn, Mare Island, Kittery, Charlestown, Norfolk, Pensacola, and League Island be retained for general purposes, the yard at Washington be used for manufacturing purposes alone, and New London be retained as a naval station.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, before the point of order is made I wish to ask that on any point of order which may be submitted the debate shall be confined to the narrowest limits. Yesterday the debate on a point of order took a somewhat wide range.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair receives the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with pleasure, and will endeavor to enforce it.

Mr. HALE. My point of order is this: The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] moves a proposition as a substitute for the whole clause relating to navy-yards. The gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] moves to amend that amendment. There are certain amendments designed to perfect the text of the original paragraph which should be first offered, or an opportunity allowed for them to be offered, that the clause in the bill may be perfected. I have one such amendment myself, and I believe the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has one. Therefore I would suggest that the amendment just read be retained until the amendments designed to perfect the clause in the bill are disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hold that the point of order is well taken; for the reason that if it is proposed to amend the bill by striking out the paragraph the friends of the paragraph are entitled to make it in the first place as perfect as they can by amendments submitted before the question is put on striking it out. The Chair therefore rules that the amendment of the gentleman from California to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will be in order after the original paragraph is perfected by such amendments as may be offered.

Mr. HALE. I offer the following amendment:

In line 45 of the bill, after the word "California," insert the words "and Kittery, Maine;" so that it will read:

For the civil establishment at the navy-yards at Brooklyn, New York; League Island, Pennsylvania; Norfolk, Virginia; Mare Island, California; and Kittery, Maine, $80,000.

I offer this amendment for this reason: The Committee on Appropriations has sought in the proposition before the House in this bill to curtail the expenses of the Government upon the theory that fewer navy-yards than we now possess need to be maintained. I agree to that general proposition. I have believed for years, from some familiarity with naval affairs, that we need fewer navy-yards than at present exist. But there are certain needs of the Navy that must be borne in mind whatever number we agree upon; and there is no one yard that for certain purposes answers what the Kittery navy-yard furnishes the Government.

My colleague [Mr. BURLEIGH] has said already, and truthfully, that the Kittery yard is the yard especially where ships coming home from long cruises, from hot and pestilential climates, can be taken with advantage. A gentleman on my right suggests that it is a good yard where disease and pestilence can be frozen out; and perhaps that expresses the idea better than anything I can say. It is far north; and for that very reason these services can be with advantage performed at that yard. There is no other yard, Mr. Chairman, that answers these purposes. The Charlestown yard does not. The Brooklyn yard does not. The Philadelphia yard does not.

I had proposed in addition to this amendment to move to increase the sum reported by the committee of $80,000 to something more, but on reflection I believe that if the authority is left as it is in the bill, with the Secretary of the Navy, he may maintain the moderate establishment at the Kittery yard and the other yards for $80,000, so that my amendment, while perfecting the section, adds nothing to the amount in the bill.

The committee did not resolve to recommend the sale of the Kittery yard, because it recognized the fact that it was needed for the purposes I have indicated. I only go further in permitting the Secretary of the Navy to keep up during the coming year such an establishment in that yard as the needs of the service require. I do not ask an additional dollar of money, and hope that the committee realizing the force of these reasons will insert what I have moved as an amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE:]

In line 45, after the word "California" and before the words "and Kittery, Maine," proposed to be inserted by Mr. HALE's amendment, insert the words "Pensacola, Florida;" and strike out "$80,000" in the same line and insert in lieu thereof "$100,000;" so that it will read:

Mare Island, California, Pensacola, Florida, and Kittery, Maine, $100,000.

I yield the floor to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. FINLEY rose.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the Chair how many amendments are pending?

The CHARMAN. But two; an amendment and an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the third, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the pending amendment is that just offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] which is to insert the words "and Kittery, Maine."

Mr. RANDALL. Is that an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS?]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has heretofore decided that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama must be held in abeyance, the point of order being made until the original section is perfected.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that amendments cannot be held in abeyance in that way. I must insist that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is either pending or it is not. It is either in the nature of a substitute or an amendment to the paragraph. My only desire is to simplify and make clear the proceedings of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would have been happy to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] when the point of order was made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] was not in order until the friends of the original paragraph should have an opportunity of perfecting it by amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. If it was an amendment it was an amendment. If it is held in abeyance it is a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that it was a motion to strike out a paragraph and insert.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I must insist upon it that there can be but two amendments pending at the same time.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the Chair decides the question, I desire to say a word. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] offered his amendment, and it was got in before the amendment proposed by the Naval Committee.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; it is the amendment of the Naval Committee.

Mr. REAGAN. This amendment was a substitute, and the gentleman from California offered an amendment to that substitute. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] then offered to perfect the original text of the bill, and the Chair decided that it was in order that he should do so. I then offered an amendment to his amendment also perfecting the original section, both of them being in order. That is the way the question now stands.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman had no right to offer an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. REAGAN. I did not do so; my amendment is in the second degree, being an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine to perfect the original text.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Alabama offered an amendment to perfect the original text.

Mr. REAGAN. No; it was a substitute for a portion of the original text of the paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. You cannot offer a substitute for a part of the paragraph.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will listen to my suggestion I think I can make it clear. The gentleman from Alabama moved a substitute for the whole paragraph.

Mr. RANDALL. If he had done that I would have had nothing to say.

Mr. HALE. I understood him to move to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir; I did not.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it would be better that we should go back and consider the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, as pending, and then allow an amendment to be offered to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask a question of the gentleman from Alabama for information. As the Chair understands, the amendment proposed yesterday by the gentleman from Alabama was an amendment to strike out the pending paragraph and insert a substitute?

Mr. LEWIS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Chair was in error in regard to that matter, his decision made on the point of order was wrong.

Mr. HALE. My point of order was hypothecated on the assumption that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama was a substitute for the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. And that was the supposition of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say—and the RECORD will bear me out in it—that what was offered by the gentleman from Alabama was a substitute from the word "dollars" in line 47.

Mr. LEWIS. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that if the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama was not intended to be in the nature of a substitute for the entire pending paragraph, it is now in order that that amendment and the amendment to it proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. PIPER] shall be received at this time.

Mr. LEWIS. My amendment was to strike out all after line 43, down to the word "commencement" in line 51, and to insert what I offered in lieu thereof, then the gentleman's amendment is in order and the amendment of the gentleman from California to that amendment will now be received.

Mr. HALE. I believe the gentleman from California yielded to me, so that mine is a separate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from California will yield to me to offer my amendment it will then be an amendment in the second degree.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from California withdraws his amendment to the amendment then the gentleman from Maine will be entitled to the floor to offer his amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from California yielded to the gentleman from Maine merely to offer an amendment perfecting the original text.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman from California yield to me?

Mr. PIPER. No, sir; I cannot.

Mr. HALE. Then if the gentleman declines to yield, I will offer mine after his is disposed of.

The amendment offered by Mr. PIPER was then read, as follows:

That the navy-yards at Brooklyn, Mare Island, Kittery, Charlestown, Norfolk, Pensacola, and League Island be retained for general purposes, and the yard at Washington be used for manufacturing purposes alone, and New London be retained as a naval station.

Mr. PIPER. As a general proposition, I am opposed to breaking up any one of the many yards of the United States. I believe that the people of our country are desirous that we should maintain a respectable naval establishment. Without a naval establishment how are we to be a commercial and maritime people in a commercial sense? I believe that it is the most suicidal policy that this House can entertain to attempt to destroy our efficiency and capacity for building national ships of war.

I regret particularly to see an attempt here to destroy and dismantle the navy-yard at Mare Island, California. Shortly after the acquisition of that territory the democratic party having acquired it, they immediately went to work like wise men and statesmen to build up a great naval establishment in the waters of the bay of San Francisco. This was a democratic measure, and I regret to see now a democratic House of Representatives entertaining for a moment the idea of dismantling that great establishment the navy-yard at Mare Island. I presume that no one will deny that it is one of the best suited for that purpose of any in the United States. It is located about thirty-five miles from the entrance of the Golden Gates, on an island of high ground in the most salubrious climate of the American Republic. It is surrounded by deep water, so that any ship can come up alongside of the bulwarks; and I believe it is now capable of building as good ships and as cheap ones as any other navy-yard in the United States.

We possess on the Pacific Ocean a sea-coast line of three thousand miles; it is seven or eight thousand miles from that coast to Brooklyn or Norfolk; and would you have ships come around here to be rebuilt at the cost of one-third of what they originally cost? The facilities for building wooden ships on the Pacific coast are quite equal at least to those of the Atlantic coast. We have the finest kind of timber there—white oak, live-oak, laurel, and every other kind of timber well suited for the construction of ships. We have had one ship of war only built at the navy-yard in California, and that a very small one, the Saginaw. She was built of green timber, and yet she lasted longer than any vessel built at the navy-yards at Pensacola, Norfolk, or Brooklyn.

In addition to this, we have at Mare Island a dry-dock about half completed, which is one of the best in the United States, and I believe as good as any in the world. We have a floating-dock there capable of taking up almost any ship, and a ship-railway upon which any ship can be drawn for repairs. We have a machine-shop there capable of building a first-class iron-clad, machinery and all.

In the face of all this, it is absolutely astounding to hear gentlemen on this floor advocate the idea of dismantling and breaking up this navy-yard, the only navy-yard we have on the Pacific coast; and that, too, when Great Britain is building a powerful navy-yard upon our northern borders, and planting armaments there with which to destroy us in case of war. If the democratic party of this House dismantles our navy-yards and destroys the Navy of the United States, it will be the Ægos Potamos of that party.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have been sent here by the people of my district to represent it, and the only navy-yard on the Pacific coast, which is located in my district. I do not propose to interfere with the amendments of any other members upon this floor. I believe the Representative from the New London district is fully competent to present his amendment here, and I propose to sustain him. But my colleague [Mr. PIPER] has seen fit to offer an amendment which he knew I had prepared in connection with this matter.

Mr. PIPER. I knew nothing of the kind.

Mr. LUTTRELL. There are a great many things that my colleague does not know; but he will learn after a while that it is a wise man who attends to his own business. I came here and, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations well knows, labored earnestly from the beginning of the Forty-third Congress to the present time to make Mare Island in my district a first-class navy-yard. In accordance with my wishes and the wishes of my constituents the Committee on Appropriations have agreed to make it a first-class navy-yard.

I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, because it strikes at the only navy-yard we have on the Pacific coast. We have a navy-yard there which when completed will be the most extensive in the civilized world.

Mr. LEWIS. We propose to retain the Mare Island navy-yard.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Your amendment simply proposes to retain it as a naval rendezvous.

Mr. LEWIS. And for repairs.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Yes, and for repairs.

Mr. LEWIS. That is all that is necessary.

Mr. LUTTRELL. We have machinery in that yard which covers acres of land and is of the finest in the United States; we have in it the most extensive workshops in the United States. We are prepared to construct vessels there as cheaply as they can be constructed in any yard of the Government. We have a harbor there some one hundred and twenty miles in length and from eight to twenty-five miles in width, and on an average from five and one-half to forty-six fathoms of water. It is the healthiest locality in the United States. We have every advantage for constructing and repairing vessels that any part of the United States has. We purchase the best English coal for $8 per ton; all the coal we have upon that coast we purchase for from six to eight dollars per ton. Can it be purchased cheaper anywhere else? We have an abundance of timber of superior quality, which can be purchased as cheaply as at any other place in the United States, and our iron on that coast is of the best quality.

We have over three thousand miles of coast which requires a navy-yard for the protection of our commerce. I hope the report of the Committee on Appropriations will be sustained, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] will not be adopted. I cannot see what object they can have in striking at the only navy-yard we have upon the Pacific coast, unless it be that they charge fraud there. I admit that frauds have been perpetrated there, not by the people, not by the navy officers, but by a political ring which has run that yard in the interest of political rings. If the navy-yard at Mare Island is to be stricken down because of corruptions in political maneuverings, what department of the Government is there to-day which upon the same principle should not be stricken down? I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] will not prevail.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, the Pensacola navy-yard is not within the district which I have the honor to represent, yet it is within a State of which that district forms a part.

This fact, however, does not control my opinion in regard to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PIPER,] which amendment I in the main approve. In the brief consideration which I have been able to give the matter I have endeavored, and I trust successfully, to relieve my mind of all sectional bias and to place the whole subject on the higher ground of a sound national policy.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, in their report and in the bill which accompanies it, propose to retain the yard at Pensacola for the purpose of repairs.

This limitation of its uses for the present is doubtless wise and judicious, and does in no just sense antagonize the commendable policy of retrenchment in the public expenditures which has been inaugurated by the House.

But the bill proposed by the Committee on Appropriations not only omits to provide for the maintenance of the Pensacola yard as a yard for repairs, but looks to its future discontinuance and abandonment.

In this refusal or omission to make any appropriation for its maintenance as a yard for repairs is involved not only an apparent question of economy but also a question of national policy of the gravest character.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do respectfully but earnestly contend that any legislation which looks to the discontinuance of either Pensacola or League Island as yards of repair and to their ultimate abandonment as proposed by the bill now before the House would be unwise as a measure of public policy, and moreover cannot be sustained upon any intelligent view of economy.

In considering the question as one of public policy, I will here venture to observe that thoughtful and reflecting statesmen will scarcely allow their opinion to be controlled by a trifling saving which the present circumstances of the country would seem to warrant, but will attentively consider not only the probabilities but also the possibilities which lie in the future and which may make it of the greatest national importance that both these yards should be continued and maintained.

It should be borne in mind that the civilized world is every year exhibiting a more enlightened and Christian disposition to cultivate the benign arts of peace rather than to encourage the barbarous and horrible practices of war.

As this sentiment strengthens its hold on the minds and hearts of mankind they will naturally, and I will add necessarily, turn their thoughts and energies to the varied employments of peaceful life.

In this condition of things it may be expected that international commerce will enter upon a career of rapid and vast expansion.

The signs of the times and the present condemnation of needless wars by the almost universal sentiment of mankind indicate that in the future the principal contests between the civilized nations of the earth will not be those of arms, but rather a struggle for commercial supremacy, whose chief theater will be on the high seas. And if the United States would not fall behind in the race of progress and prosperity they must enter into the competition in the spirit of an active and generous emulation, guided and directed by an enlightened commercial policy.

But we should remember, and remember now while we have under consideration the provisions of this bill, that, as individual disputes are constantly growing out of the unavoidable competitions of private and domestic trade, so controversies may be expected to arise out of the struggles of rival nations for commercial supremacy.

In view of the unavoidable contingencies and the vicissitudes which must attend the expanded and ever-expanding commerce of a country like our own—a commerce which plows every sea and visits every land—we may not hope or expect always to escape armed collisions with our commercial rivals.

To hold ourselves in readiness to meet such exigencies when they arise, and to make timely and adequate preparation for war when it must and does come, is but to exercise a provident foresight which wise and thoughtful statesmen will not overlook.

Agreeing as I do with the Committee on Naval Affairs in the general proposition that in a time of assured peace it is unnecessary to maintain our naval establishment on a war footing, yet I contend that a sufficient number of ships and guns should be kept afloat to give ample protection to our commerce upon every sea, and also that our navy-yards should be kept and maintained in such a condition and with such supplies of material for construction on hand as will enable the Government whenever there should be war, either actual or threatened, to convert them instantly into yards of active and efficient construction.

If this be sound policy—and I imagine the proposition as I have stated it will not be denied—I will now proceed to present for the consideration of the committee certain facts in support of the amendment which provides for the retention of the Pensacola navy-yard; and, as these facts cannot be denied, it is unnecessary to do more than simply to state them.

First. That it is the only navy-yard on the Gulf of Mexico.

Second. That it is located on a bay with the best entrance and harbor on the Gulf of Mexico.

Third. That it has perfect security in the military fortifications which command the entrance to the harbor.

Fourth. That it is within a gulf that is almost land-locked, which renders it capable of an easy, and I may say, impregnable defense, and thereby securing to our Navy a secure cover, if at any future time we should be driven from the Atlantic by the naval powers of Europe through a hostile combination.

Fifth. That in view of such possibilities, (which, in my judgment, it were wise to anticipate,) it is not too much to say that the time may come, and will come, how soon no one can tell, when a navy-yard for construction on the Gulf will become a national necessity.

Sixth. That it is contignous to an almost inexhaustible supply of the finest live-oak and yellow-pine timber for the construction of vessels of war and for spars and masts in the United States.

Seventh. That it has easy, convenient, and secure railroad communication with the rich coal-fields and magnificent iron-mines of Alabama and Tennessee.

Eighth. That if it be the true policy of the Government to retain it, as recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs, then it will be true economy to maintain it for the present as a yard for repairs, so that it may in the future, when the exigencies of national defense may require it, be readily converted into a yard for the construction of ships of war, of wood or iron as may be necessary.

Ninth. If it be right to retain and maintain the Pensacola navy-yard for the reasons I have stated, then, upon the score of economy, it would be unwise to abandon it after having already expended millions and millions in its establishment and construction; and in my judgment adequate appropriations should be made at the present time for maintaining it as a yard for repairs at least if not for the collection of ship-timbers and for other needful preparations for constructing war vessels, when in the unforeseen contingencies of the future they may be needed for national defense or for the protection of a commerce which, if we act wisely, is bound to take the lead among all the nations of the earth. In regard to the navy-yards at League Island and Mare Island I will remark that, for the reasons so strongly presented by various gentlemen on this floor, I am satisfied that they should be retained as yards for repairs for the present and for the construction of vessels of war in the future, when required, and shall therefore vote for it.

Mr. WAIT. The brief time that is allowed me under the rules of the House compels me to state in the fewest words possible the grounds on which I rest my opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, which points to a recession of the naval depot at New London to the State of Connecticut.

Prior to 1862 great changes had taken place in the manner of constructing and arming vessels of war, involving a radical change in naval architecture, and demanding the enlargement of old naval yards and the establishment of new ones. To meet this emergency and to select a suitable sight for a new navy-yard and naval depot, adequate to the new and peculiar requirements of the day, Congress empowered the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board, composed of the most intelligent and experienced naval officers and engineers, to examine Narraganset Bay, the harbor of New London, and League Island, and to report by the selection of which the public interest would be best subserved. A thorough and careful examination was made by Commodores Stringham, Gardner, and Van Brundt, and Chief Engineer Sanger; they reported in due time the result of such examination to the Secretary of the Navy, and to that report was appended the following resolution:

Resolved, That the harbor of New London possesses greater advantages for a navy-yard and naval depot than any other location examined by this board.

But Congress did not permit the matter to rest here. In 1864 it directed the Naval Committee of the House to visit the proposed site at New London, to make a thorough examination of the harbor and its surroundings, and to report the result of such careful investigation. The committee made a most thorough personal examination and an elaborate report, which report concluded in the following language:

The site near New London, presenting such great natural and economical advantages, has been tendered as a free gift to the Government. The committee recommend its acceptance; and for the purpose of locating thereat a navy-yard and depot, such as is contemplated by the naval authorities, they recommend the passage of the accompanying bill for a public act.

Congress becoming convinced from the report of the board of officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy and that of the Naval Committee of the House of the very prominent and controlling advantages presented by the site for a navy-yard on the banks of the Thames, springing out of the accessibility of the harbor of New London at all seasons of the year; its protection from invasion by the fortifications at its month; its admirable capacity to shelter shipping in the most unfavorable conditions of weather from the winds and the waves; the great depth and width of the channel leading from the mouth of the harbor to the proposed site of the naval depot; its comparative freedom from ice, even in the most rigorous winters; the favorable character of the soil; its proximity to the extensive mechanical establishments that exist throughout New England; and the facility with which all the material required for the construction or repairing of war vessels could be obtained, took further and important action at its session in 1867, and passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to receive and accept a deed of gift, when offered by the State of Connecticut, of a tract of land, with not less than one mile of shore front, lying on the Thames River, near New London, Connecticut, to be held by the United States for naval purposes.

The State of Connecticut having thus formally been invited by the people of the Union, speaking through their representatives in Congress, to convey such tract of land to the United States by the action of its Legislature, empowered commissioners to execute and deliver a deed of gift of the tract of land on the banks of the Thames and relinquished its jurisdiction over the same, as required by the votes of Congress and the laws of the United States.

And Congress from the time that this territory was presented by the State of Connecticut and accepted by the United States for the purposes for which it was originally donated have made appropriations for the improvement of the same amounting in the aggregate to nearly $150,000, which appropriations have been expended in grading the ground, the construction of a wharf eight hundred feet in length, and the erection of store-houses and mechanics' shops and other buildings proper for the purposes of a naval depot.

While this proposition to locate a navy-yard on the bank of the Thames was pending before Congress, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, alive to the very great advantages which that city would derive from the location of this naval depot at New London in adding to its defenses and protecting its commerce, presented the following preamble and resolutions to Congress, urging that body to take immediate steps to obtain the site and make such appropriations as would lead to the immediate establishment of a navy-yard:

Whereas the Secretary of the Navy called the attention of Congress to the necessity of an additional navy-yard and depot, adapted to the enlarged wants of the country; and whereas the location of said yard and depot is of vast importance to our city as a defense against foreign aggression; and whereas a board of six naval officers and engineers were appointed under an order of Congress to survey and examine [naming other sites] the harbor of New London, Connecticut, with reference to their capacity and fitness for that object, and to report by the selection of which place the public interest would be best promoted; and whereas a majority of the said board, after devoting more than two months to a careful, laborious, and thorough survey and examination of said sites, and after a full discussion of their advantages, immediate and incidental, came to the conclusion "that the harbor of New London possessed the necessary capacity and fitness for such a yard, and that the public interests would be promoted by its establishment there;" and whereas, during the present session of Congress, the Naval Committee, together with a delegation from the Military Committee and the Committee of Ways and Means, have visited and personally examined the said sites, and a majority have recently reported in favor of the harbor of New London: Therefore,

Resolved, That in view of the importance of this question to the whole country, and especially to the interests of commerce and navigation, which are especially protected by the Navy, and in which this city is so deeply interested, this chamber fully concurs in the expression of opinion of the said board of naval officers and engineers, and of said Naval Committee, and do earnestly urge upon Congress to speedily pass a law establishing the navy-yard and depot at New London, and to appropriate the means for carrying the same into effect.

Resolved, That the preamble and resolutions be duly authenticated and transmitted to both Houses of Congress by the hands of a committee, consisting of Messrs. Marshall and McCurdy.

A. A. LOWE,
President Chamber of Commerce State of New York.
JOHN AUSTIN STEVENS,
Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce.

As additional evidence of the deep interest which the city of New York took in the prosecution of this national work, and its vital importance, not only to that city but to the commerce of the country a very large number of its leading merchants and prominent public men, in 1869, addressed a memorial to Congress, from which I read the following extract:

The undersigned believe, in addition to the intrinsic advantages of this location for a navy-yard, that its use for that purpose would largely contribute to the protection of the commerce of Long Island Sound and of the great city of New York in the event of a naval war. It may be assumed that this country has, in a future war with a foreign power, nothing to fear except for its commerce and the cities adjacent to the coast. But in the event of a naval war the first point of attack would undoubtedly be the city of New York, as it so largely concentrates the capital and the commerce of the nation. That city at present is nearly defenseless to a foreign foe in its approaches from the ocean through Long Island Sound. The Sound once entered forms a great natural roadstead or harbor for a foreign fleet. It was so occupied by the British navy in the war of 1812 threatening the whole coast line and the city of New York itself. The site at New London is the strategic point which covers the entrance of the Sound, and, in the opinion of competent engineers and naval authorities, occupied as a naval station would furnish adequate protection to the city of New York and the commerce of the Sound, thus guarding the communication between the great industries of New England and their natural market.

We hope that you will see proper to recommend that an appropriation for this object be made at the next session of Congress.

Within a few days past the Chamber of Commerce has again passed resolutions favoring the continuance of the existing yard, and reiterating all which that body enunciated in its favor in 1864.

The establishment of a navy-yard or naval station upon the river Thames has had the unhesitating approval of the highest naval officials, who have spoken from personal observation, no one using more emphatic language in favor of this site than Commodore D. M. Fairfax, one of the most distinguished officers of the Navy, and who is now in command of the yard.

The Secretary of the Navy, in his report to Congress, in 1872, in referring to this station, used this language:

I have heretofore spoken of the claims of the New London station on the liberality of Congress. Some of these are to be found in a good harbor, easy of access from all directions, and conveniently situated between two great commercial cities, an industrious and ingenious people whose labor is skillful and cheap, and a site for the station already acquired through the liberality of the State, to the improvement of which the Government seems to be virtually pledged. It is already a station of convenience to the service, and with moderate expenditure its use could be largely increased.

That the people of Connecticut feel a deep interest in the continuance of this important national institution, and that Congress should render such pecuniary aid as would insure its permanency and success, is evidenced by the following preamble and resolutions, which, during the past week, have passed both branches of the Legislature of the State by unanimous votes:

Whereas the navy-yard established on the Thames River, near New London, in this State, has been shown by the various reports made in its favor, under the authority of Congress, and by the testimony of eminent naval officers and nautical men, to possess every requisite for a first-class naval establishment—safe anchorage, deep water, extensive shore front, and solid ground for the foundation of whatever structure may be put upon it without piling, and within a harbor always free from ice, easy of access, and from which vessels may be quick to sea—confessedly the best on the Atlantic coast; and whereas a wharf has been built at this station where some of the largest vessels of the Navy are now lying, and other valuable improvements have been made at small cost; and whereas the said navy-yard has been so fortunately located by the Government, within half an hour's steaming of the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, as to afford efficient protection at that point by the presence of iron-clads and other means, not only to the waters and commerce of the Sound, which should ever be kept inviolate from hostile approach by the open sea, but to the entire coast line of Connecticut and New York bordering on the Sound; also to the great cities of New York and Brooklyn, from naval attack on the east—a protection made still more necessary by the deepening of the channel of Hell Gate, while in no other way can these great interests be so economically and effectually defended, thus raising the subject to one of vast national importance: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to use every effort to bring to the attention of Congress the real merits of the navy-yard and naval depot on the Thames River and to urge the necessary appropriation for the continuance of the work thereat.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State and to the presiding officers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives at Washington.

Should the United States now abandon the site on the Thames as a naval station, I believe that it would revert, with all the improvements which have been made upon the same by the General Government, to the original owners of the soil. Is it policy then, I ask, on the part of Congress to throw away property of which it can retain possession without incurring any more than a mere nominal annual expenditure; property which, in some future contingency, may be of inestimable value to the Union?

As I have already said, Congress, by its action, virtually invited the State of Connecticut to legislate in such manner as would authorize the condemnation and purchase of the site occupied by this yard. The territory was obtained by the State, and then conveyed to and accepted by the United States solely for naval purposes. It was so written in the bond. Is not the State of Connecticut then, having in all that it did acted in good faith, fully justified when it protests against the dismantling of this yard and its reconveyance to the State or the original proprietors; and is not the General Government bound by every principle of honor and justice to keep inviolate the contract which it in fact made with the State to establish and maintain a naval station on the banks of the Thames?

Mr. LEWIS. Those gentlemen who rise here for the purpose of advocating their different navy-yards do not give us the benefits of facts. In regard to the navy-yard at New London, it is incomplete; the channel of the Thames River, upon which it is situated, is exceedingly narrow, and first-class steamers of the American Navy cannot turn around in that river except with the most careful handling. An ordinary vessel cannot swing at anchor there without striking on either side. The Government authorities require the pilots of steamers coming down the river to slow their engines and stop their paddle-wheels in order to prevent the agitation of the water and the injury of the shores. The hills rise from the water so as to make a rugged surface composed of clay and granite, with rocks and bowlders, which cannot be reduced to a proper level except at the most enormous cost; nor can the necessary excavations be made except at an immense expense. There are no fortifications there that can properly defend the place from an incursion of the enemy. The harbor there has a beautiful entrance from the ocean; but the only defenses, Fort Trumbull and Fort Griswold, would not be adequate to meet the attacks of modern warfare. Nor is there any large city there whose fortifications would protect a navy-yard, as in the case of Brooklyn, Charlestown, League Island, and other navy-yards. Yet gentlemen would have us rear a fort there, plant batteries, level granite hills, excavate rocks, all for the purpose of establishing a navy-yard upon a channel too narrow for such purposes and at a location without any facilities for supplying coal and iron except at a large cost for transportation. These are the facts. This committee has no prejudice against New London. Every consideration would induce us to favor the good old State of Connecticut. Nor have we any prejudice against League Island.

The gentleman from California attacks the committee because we do not think it wise to retain Mare Island as a navy-yard for the purposes of construction.

What facilities has Mare Island for constructing ships, for building machinery, for making hulls and spars? At Mare Island where do you get your live-oak? From Florida and Alabama and Louisiana. Where do you get your yellow pine? What is pig-iron worth there to-day?

Mr. LUTTRELL. We can get our iron from California, Oregon, and Washington Territory.

Mr. LEWIS. That may be; but iron which to-day is selling in the East at $16 and $18 a ton brings $46 a ton in San Francisco. Look at the immense cost of lumber. And is not your machinery built in New York and transported to California by railroad?

Mr. LUTTRELL. That is done in the interest of a political ring, and not at the instance of naval officers.

Mr. LEWIS. The location is so far away that I suppose the Government cannot hold its commandants and constructors and supply-agents to a rigid accountability.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Give the whole matter in charge of the naval officers, and purchases will be made as cheaply as at New York.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, we all admit the necessity of a station there as a naval rendezvous and for repairs; but no argument can be urged in favor of that location for a navy-yard for purposes of construction. Why, sir, look at the advantages Kittery has over it; look at the superior advantages of Charlestown and Brooklyn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, obtained the floor and yielded his time to Mr. WAIT.

Mr. WAIT. Mr. Chairman, a few words in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS.] I fancy that that gentleman has never visited the good old State of Connecticut which he has eulogized so highly, for which I tender him my thanks.

Mr. LEWIS. O, yes, I have visited Connecticut four or five times.

Mr. WAIT. Then the gentlemen did not give a proper examination to the proposed site on the river Thames and its advantages for a navy-yard—advantages partly the gift of nature and partly the results of intelligent engineering. He must have surveyed it from some mountain summit, as the Jewish leader gazed at the promised land. He referred to the site as broken by rugged hills filled with bowlders and ledges. Why, sir, at the spot where the yard is located, there is one mile of river front, and a very large part of that front is graded down and faced with a valuable wharf over eight hundred feet in length. Let me say further to the gentleman that there is a channel in front of that wharf six hundred feet in width, in which the Dictator turned without difficulty; and one of the largest ships now in the service floats with ease in that channel which the gentleman sees fit to condemn. Let me further respond to him that, according to the testimony of competent engineers, that channel can by dredging be increased to a width of eight hundred feet. The channel at Norfolk, which the gentleman proposes to retain as a naval station, was originally, some thirty years ago, only three hundred feet in width, and it is now but six hundred. When this site on the banks of the Thames in Connecticut is properly improved by engineering skill there will be a channel eight hundred feet wide and from twenty-five to forty feet deep.

In regard to the forts at the mouth of the harbor, at which the gentleman sneers, I must think that he cannot have read American history. Sir, when the gallant Decatur was driven by the British men-of-war from Long Island Sound he took refuge in the river Thames, and near the very point where it is proposed to build up and continue this navy-yard; and the guns of the little fort and turf battery at the mouth of the river drove off the British cruisers and protected and saved Decatur and his fleet.

The gentleman does not properly appreciate what we Yankees have done and can do in Connecticut. [Laughter and applause.] He must have forgotten the struggle on the heights of Groton, and how the men of Connecticut, before they would allow a foreign foe to invade their land, died in their tracks while resisting the British invaders a hundred years ago. Besides, sir, there are railroads terminating at that navy-yard; and by those roads thousands of men could be rapidly brought there when necessary for the protection of the Government property which would be at this yard.

One word more and I am done. Gentlemen talk about promoting economy by abandoning this navy-yard. Sir, the Government of the United States has already expended $150,000 to $200,000 there. If you abandon that navy-yard what becomes of the Government property there and the valuable improvements that have been made at public expense?

Every intelligent lawyer in this House knows that fixtures attached to really must go with it, and under the terms of the conveyance from the State to the United States this Government property must return to the original owners of the land. Will gentlemen then throw away this valuable property, which in important exigencies that may arise will be found to be of a value that can scarcely be appreciated at the present time?

There was a distinct invitation to the people of Connecticut to come forward and by purchase to obtain this land. We did it honorably on our part. We obtained the site and deeded it to the General Government for the purpose desired by Congress. We carried out our contract in good faith. Connecticut in everything which she has done has acted fairly and honorably. I ask this House at this juncture to act fairly and honorably as between the Government and the State that I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. BLOUNT obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman from Georgia proceeds, the Chair desires to state he has permitted this debate to go on out of order. Under the five-minute rule there can be but one speech for and one against an amendment, when it must be voted upon or withdrawn. The Chair has not enforced the rule strictly, as he thought by allowing the debate to proceed as far as it has done ultimately time would be saved to the committee. He now deems it to be a duty incumbent upon him hereafter strictly to enforce the rule.

Mr. RANDALL. The rule will be enforced hereafter?

The CHAIRMAN. It will. The Chair desires further to state that he holds it to be a palpable violation of the rule for one gentleman to take the floor in his own right and then yield it to another gentleman who has already spoken on the same subject, when the rule declares that no member shall be allowed to speak twice upon any question until all other members desiring to speak who have not spoken shall be heard.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I think it will not be questioned by any one that navy-yards in this country have multiplied to an extent far beyond the public service. Such certainly is the view entertained by the Secretary of the Navy. It is the view also of every officer connected with the Navy. It is certainly the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, who have been examining into this matter. I undertake to say that there is scarcely a man in this House who will assert the contrary. It is true, then, that we must cut down somewhere. We must abandon some of these yards if we mean to retrench at all where it can properly be done.

Assuming this to be true, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations, as they have done everywhere else, have not hesitated, no matter whom it may hurt, to bring forward a measure that commended itself to their judgment and which they thought, no matter what local interests might be affected thereby, would commend itself to the good judgment of the country. What do we see in this bill? There is an appropriation of $1,500,000 for construction and repair of the whole Navy of the United States. I think I have heretofore shown we were justified in that purpose. Are we to continue nine navy-yards with all their bureaus, with all their civil lists, and expect the country will consider we have done our duty? If there is abuse anywhere, if there is extravagance anywhere, the feeling certainly has been that it has been connected with the Navy. Our committee have seen fit to confine the operations of the navy-yards during the coming fiscal year to Brooklyn, Norfolk, Mare Island, and League Island.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now offer a substitute for the entire paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the civil establishments of the several navy-yards, $85,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to organize a naval board of five commissioned officers in the Navy as soon as practicable, whose duty it shall be to examine fully and determine whether, in their opinion, any of the navy-yards can be dispensed with and abandoned; and, if so, to report the best manner of making disposition of the same; and further to inquire as to the propriety of establishing a naval rendezvous at Tybee Island or at Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia, and whether any Government property at said islands can be made available and is suitable for such purpose; and said board shall, through the Secretary of the Navy, report to Congress at the commencement of the next session the result of their inquiry; and the sum of $2,000 is herewith appropriated to meet the expenses incurred by said board.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, I have, with many others, listened to the debate on this subject, and it has taken a very wide range. Gentlemen who represent navy-yards, as I do, without regard to the side of the House where they sit, naturally enough favor their own yards. I believe I have offered an amendment which reaches an intelligent and business view of the subject. I should be sorry indeed to see any navy-yard abolished on the recommendation or urgent appeal made by gentlemen who have never seen the ground. The truth is, action only should be taken upon the report after careful consideration of scientific men, men who from their profession and long experience are capable of judging what is best to be done.

The original proposition of the committee as to New London did give direction that the New London yard should be retroceded, or that steps should be taken to that end. For one, I have come clearly to the conclusion even that would be an unsafe thing to do, except we did it upon the responsibility of an intelligent board convened for that purpose. In this amendment, so far as the economic view goes, we reach it, because we give to the Secretary of the Navy but so much money, which in all probability will be sufficient, and he can if he chooses select such yards in which he can do the most work, such for repairs, such for new work, and such best adapted to manufacturing purposes.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. RANDALL. In a moment. I think the House will conclude after what they have heard that this substitute is in the right direction, and I hope that the House will adopt it. I will now listen to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he amend his amendment, so that as regards the organization of the board it shall include the three senior officers in the Navy.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection, so that I get intelligent men, whether they be three or five—intelligent men, men of experience, whose profession qualifies them to understand the subject, and whose life has made them familiar with the naval affairs of the country. That is all I wish in this connection. When we get this information then we can act. I have no objection to the committee voting on the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee as an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. BANKS. What is the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. This is my amendment: Amend the amendment by inserting after the word "practicable" these words, "three of whom shall be the senior officers upon the active list of the Navy;" so that it will read, "for the civil establishments of the several navy-yards $85,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to organize a naval board of five commissioned officers in the Navy as soon as practicable, three of whom shall be the senior officers upon the active-list of the Navy, whose duty, &c."

Mr. BANKS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLOUNT. Following up the idea I was stating when on the floor before, I ask to have the attention of the House for a moment to see how far the Committee on Naval Affairs in their proposition fails to meet the wants of the country in this direction. The speech of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] discloses the fact that while they speak of Mare Island as a rendezvous and a place for repairs, they do not intend to interfere with its present status in any way. I think it is proper it should not be done. But in reference to the various other yards, Pensacola, &c., it will be seen that the Committee on Naval Affairs do not propose any reduction really at any of these points. The gentleman from Tennessee himself states in his speech that there never have been at Pensacola more than one or two vessels constructed. The only proposition in the way of retrenchment that comes from that committee is that in relation to League Island and New London. So far as New London is concerned, the question is simply one of expense. I think it ought to be disposed of, and no one has undertaken to defend the propriety of retaining it. Save the gentlemen from that State, there is not a word from any Department, from any source outside of the State of Connecticut, favoring it.

As to League Island, during this debate I have acquired a good deal of information in reference to it. I have listened to gentlemen here who have been familiar with the history of the League Island navy-yard, and who have presented the merits of that yard with a great deal of elaboration and a great deal of force in a manner strongly to impress me. Its peculiar importance has been thoroughly presented. I shall not take up the time of the House in reference to that; but I will say that if the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations is defective, that of the Naval Committee is far more defective. If there may be some little questions as to the choice of yards that may be abandoned, there is a direct and certain proposition that many of them shall be cut off.

We do not propose in the bill the immediate sale of these yards. We propose a suspension of some of them. The Bureau of Yards and Docks, in a communication which has been handed me, shows that in the mere matter of the suspension of these several yards proposed by our committee there is a saving of $183,086.80, and calling attention to their own estimate they disclose the fact that there might be a much larger saving at several of these yards. For instance, at the Kittery yard instead of $5,000 the amount of $2,700 might be substituted in the matter of gas and coal. At the Boston navy-yard there might be a still further reduction on the items of gas, water, &c., from $15,000 down to $4,000. And running all through the list the saving that will be accomplished by this will amount to about $200,000. And all the repairs that our Navy requires can be accomplished at other yards. Why, then, should we hesitate in this matter? It seems to me that it is our highest duty to carry out what is here proposed.

So far as the proposition coming from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, I must say that, after bestowing upon it a great deal of attention, I cannot concur in that proposition. No man in this House knows better than I do his large experience and his sound judgment; and no man would hesitate more than I would to separate from him upon that proposition. It doubtless comes in a spirit of compromise. But the proposition of the Committee on Appropriations has been carefully considered; has been the result of conference with the various Bureaus, and I believe it is the true proposition in the interest of economy. I trust, therefore, that the House will see fit to sustain the committee in that regard.

Mr. WHITTHORNE obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD.]

Mr. DANFORD. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] to come in after the words "State of Georgia."

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is admissible at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. This is an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment has already been offered to the substitute.

Mr. RANDALL. But not in the second degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that under the rule there can be no amendment in the second degree to a substitute. The substitute itself is in the nature of an amendment, and an amendment to that is in the last degree admissible under the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest then to the gentleman from Ohio that he wait until the other amendment is disposed of, the one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] Then his amendment will be in order.

Mr. DANFORD. Very well; I will do so.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to make just one remark on my amendment proposed to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and that is, that in constituting this board of naval officers, the three senior officers of the Navy shall be appointed, as they will be men who have no partiality, and nothing to gain.

Mr. RANDALL. How do you know that?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. They may not at least, and I should judge so from the vote of the House yesterday. Now, from the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, it appears, as is also shown from his course, that he desires to antagonize the Committee on Naval Affairs. We have felt his blows and we have appreciated his labors, and are somewhat at a loss to understand the motives for his course and that of his associates upon the Committee on Appropriations. But the misfortune of the Committee on Naval Affairs has been that it did not concur in the views of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to League Island and Cockspur Island. That I think is the only offense that the Committee on Naval Affairs has been guilty of. The gentleman says that the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs is not in the line of economy. I beg you, sir, and I beg the House to remember that the very moment they determine to carry out the idea of building a navy-yard at League Island it commits them to an expenditure of from $20,000,000 to $50,000,000; and when we go down to Cockspur Island God Almighty only knows what the expense will be there. No man on the Committee on Appropriations, neither the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor any of his colleagues have had the frankness and courage to tell the country and the House that to-day if you do anything to provide for the building of a navy-yard at League Island the country is committed to an expenditure of $600,000. Have gentlemen not taken into consideration that $30,000 per annum will be required for the purpose of building up the navy-yard at League Island? Who has said anything in this debate about that? Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL?] Has any member from Philadelphia who has spoken? Sir, it has been kept from the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not the money in the Treasury as payment for the Philadelphia navy-yard of a million dollars?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is there, and the House by previous legislation committed itself to the expenditure of that money if it proceeds in this work.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, it was derived from Philadelphia.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If the House to-day will not stop the work at League Island they will have to pay $666,000.

Mr. KELLEY. Belonging to Philadelphia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that debate upon the amendment is exhausted, and debate can only continue by the withdrawal of the amendment, and that by unanimous consent, as the rules distinctly state.

Mr. BANKS. What is the question before the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The question now pending is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PIPER.]

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a suggestion.

Mr. BANKS. I would first like to know what the question is.

The CHAIRMAN. If the committee comes to a vote at this time it must be on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PIPER.]

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that by general consent a vote be taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] as an amendment to my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. BANKS. I want to say a word upon that.

Mr. RANDALL. As soon as the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee shall have been voted on the gentleman will have an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. BANKS. Is the proposition to take a vote upon the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL?]

The CHAIRMAN. That is what has been asked.

Mr. BANKS. Has it been modified?

Mr. RANDALL. No; but I will propose to open it to modification.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman tell us why he designates three of the officers who are to compose the proposed commission?

Mr. RANDALL. I did not offer that. It is the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BANKS. No; but I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has accepted that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to understand whether there is any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BANKS. I object, unless I can have an opportunity to say a word.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will have that opportunity when the vote has been taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee whether it be voted down or be voted in.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, but the question will then be settled, and it will be too late to speak upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed five minutes.

Mr. BANKS. Two minutes is all I want.

No objection was made.

Mr. BANKS. It is wrong to designate specific officers who shall constitute this commission. I do not object to the inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for it will give us all the information that the country requires, and whatever that commission reports and Congress agrees to no doubt will be for the interest of the country. But we ought not to tie up a commission to specific officers; not that I object to any of the persons named, but this is the fact, that in times past propositions have been made here to put the whole control of the Navy Department and of the navy-yards in the hands of the leading officers of that Department. Now the Secretary of the Navy is a civil officer, and this Government is a civil government, and if we have a commission of the persons proposed here we may have revived the old plan of establishing an oligarchy on the basis of the Navy Department.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I want to keep this matter outside of any political influence; that is my object.

Mr. SMALLS. I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the House before the question is taken to have a few letters read from the Department, and also some from citizens of Port Royal, showing that Cockspur Island or Tybee Island is not fit for this purpose. I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I ask unanimous consent of the House that a couple of letters be read.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection at all, but I suggest to the member from South Carolina that after the amendment has been disposed of there will be an amendment offered on which the gentleman from South Carolina can be heard.

Mr. SMALLS. Very well.

The question was taken on Mr. WHITTHORNE's amendment to Mr. RANDALL's substitute; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 85.

Mr. LEWIS. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. DANFORD were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 73.

So the amendment to the substitute was agreed to.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute as amended.

Mr. DANFORD. I move to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "Georgia" the words "or at any other point on the coast of Georgia or South Carolina."

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DANFORD. This refers to the establishment of a naval station and rendezvous upon the coast of Georgia or South Carolina. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. SMALLS.]

Mr. SMALLS. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I shall ask only that some letters may be read by the Clerk to show that neither Tybee Island nor Cockspur Island is a suitable place for a naval rendezvous.

The Clerk read as follows:

PORT ROYAL RAILROAD COMPANY, RECEIVER'S OFFICE,
Augusta, Georgia, May 17, 1876.

DEAR SIR: The people of Beaufort and Port Royal are greatly exercised over the report of the Naval Committee recommending that Tybee or Cockspur be used as a naval station for the North Atlantic fleet. We all feel assured that you will do your utmost to oppose the removal of the fleet from Port Royal, and that from your practical knowledge of the harbor and its approaches we hope you may be able to show to Congress the great mistake that would be made by such removal.

It was only the other day that a case occurred which proved the superior advantages of Port Royal Harbor over Tybee. The German steamship Berlin had loaded part of her cargo of cotton at Charleston and came round to Tybee to load up. She lay in the roads while her cotton and coal were lightered down to her. When loaded she drew nearly twenty-two feet of water. Just at that time the prevailing winds had been westerly, which kept the tides very low, and the Berlin was detained over one week waiting for a high tide to cross the bar, and during that delay the captain, engineer, and agent hired a tug, came into Port Royal, and, sounding all the way up to the dock, were very much surprised to find such a magnificent harbor, with an approach that a steamer double the size of the Berlin could come to the dock with perfect ease and safety. Now, if the Berlin had been a United States ship of war, ordered away on an important mission, how serious might have been the results.

I take the liberty of writing you these important facts, which may aid you in your efforts. The test of coal has not yet been made at Port Royal. I am going North to-morrow, and will stay over in Washington a day and see you.

Yours, truly,

D. C. WILSON.

Hon. ROBERT SMALL,
United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE SUPERVISING SURGEON-GENERAL, UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL SERVICE,
Washington, May 22, 1876.

SIR: In response to your letter of to-day, asking for such information as this Office may possess relative to the sanitary condition of the harbors at Savannah, Georgia, and Port Royal, South Carolina, I beg to say that there is nothing on record in this Office that bears any reference to the question, beyond the fact that at Savannah, Georgia, 456 sick and disabled seamen applied for and were furnished medical treatment during the past fiscal year, while at Beaufort, South Carolina, there are scarcely any applicants for relief; which facts are, of course, chiefly attributable to the difference in the extent of the shipping at the respective places. It may be stated, however, that a very large proportion of the diseases of the merchant-marine patients treated at Savannah is due to malarial influences.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

JNO. M. WOODWORTH,
Supervising Surgeon-General.

Hon. ROBERT SMALLS,
United States House of Representatives.

Sanitary report for 1875.

UNITED STATES STEAMER DICTATOR,
Port Royal Sound, South Carolina, January 1, 1876.

* * * The average daily population of the Navy in Port Royal waters since April 14 has been 499, which gives an average yearly naval population of 356 souls. There were two deaths in the entire force, one on the Colorado from an injury, and the other on the Pawnee from drowning. This makes the annual death rate of the Navy in Port Royal waters 5.6 per 1,000 men. In an average yearly population of 365 persons not a single death has occurred from any disease. * * *

JOHN C. SPEAR,
Surgeon United States Navy.

UNITED STATES STEAMER DICTATOR, SECOND RATE,
Port Royal, South Carolina, October 1, 1875.

SIR: * * * The ship's company has enjoyed remarkable freedom from malarial fevers during the summer and autumn months of this quarter. Of the five cases of intermittent reported only one is due to local causes, the other four being recurrent attacks. The two cases of remittent reported were contracted here, but in both there was special exposure on shore while in a state of intoxication.

Owing to insufficient berthing space below, half of the crew of the Dictator is obliged in warm weather to sleep on deck under the awning, and her people are in consequence specially exposed to any malaria there may be in the night air. It therefore seems that the remarkable healthfulness of her crew, under the circumstances, affords good evidence of comparative freedom of this locality from malaria.

The Dictator, during the time referred to, was anchored in Beaufort River, opposite Mr. English's plantation, half a mile from low marshy shores on either side. No large body of fresh water empties into the rivers here, so that the river water is nearly as salt as that of the sea. The sea-breeze in July, August, and September, begins by ten a. m. and continues till midnight, blowing generally quite fresh. The mean relative humidity for the quarter has been found to be 76, day and night, which, considering the proximity of the sea and the extent of swamp lands, shows that the climate of Port Royal is, relatively, a dry one. It is possible the above natural causes furnish an explanation as to the healthfulness of the waters of Port Royal.

When the fleet arrived here in April, no sufficient supply of wholesome spring water could be obtained here, and a water-boat was engaged to bring water from Charleston; later, however, a good spring was found near Beaufort, and water from it has been in use on board since August 31. This water has been found pure and wholesome, and much better than that obtained from Charleston.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN C. SPEAR,
Surgeon United States Navy.

Medical Inspector SAMUEL F. COUES, U. S. N.,
United States Flag-Ship Worcester.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. If the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is to prevail—that is, for the appointment of a naval commission to examine into the propriety or policy of establishing a naval rendezvous in the southern waters—then I admit that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] would be correct. But, in my judgment, the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should not be adopted by this House, and for this reason: If there be any policy or expediency in locating a naval rendezvous on Tybee Island or Cockspur Island, in the Savannah River, that expediency and policy extend to its being done at once.

It is recommended by a head of a Bureau in the Navy Department, not by citizens of the locality which may be benefited by it, not by any sanitary department which simply gives its opinion that there is less sickness at Port Royal than at Savannah, when the fact is that, as shown by the reports, the Savannah shipping takes into that port thirty thousand seamen annually while but a few hundred go into the port of Port Royal. I refer to the report printed in the RECORD and submitted by my colleague, who is on the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

I ask the attention of members of this committee to a few facts in that report to which I will hastily advert. The fleet is now kept at rendezvous at Port Royal. The harbor of Port Royal is entirely of salt water; it has no facilities of fresh water for the monitors to lie in or for the crews to drink. Commodore Ammen declares that pure fresh water can be obtained at Savannah at all seasons of the year, at the head of Elba Island, or at a distance of about ten miles from the entrance of the river, and several miles lower down during a considerable part of the year. This would not only be of great advantage and economy for drinking, but also in preventing rust and the accumulation of barnacles and other animal and vegetable growths on the bottoms of iron vessels. This condition is of marked contrast to Port Royal.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he desires this commission to sit and report to Congress six months from now, and he asks it in the line of economy. In that connection I ask him to listen to this statement by the chief of the Bureau of Navigation of the Navy Department:

The fresh-water bills of the Dictator for six months amount to $4,584.18, at the rate of $9,168.36 yearly. With the force now making rendezvous at Port Royal the cost for drinking water will be not less than $100,000 yearly.

Mr. SMALLS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I have not time. It would appear from this statement that postponing this matter for six months would cost the country in drinking-water alone $50,000. Commodore Ammen says further that there are no fortifications at Port Royal while there are fortifications at Savannah; that the climate at Cockspur Island and Tybee Island is salubrious all the year round. He goes on to give other advantages of Tybee Island over Port Royal or even Brunswick, in my own State. He says that he knows these facts from a personal knowledge of the localities themselves. He is a disinterested witness, not a party having an interest in the locality, but an officer at the head of one of the chief Bureaus of the Navy Department.

Notwithstanding this, it is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to continue the present condition of things for six months longer. It may be said that the Secretary of the Navy can remove the rendezvous now if he sees fit, but the answer to that is that he has not done it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. DANFORD was then agreed to; there being on a division ayes 75, noes not counted.

Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina. I move to amend the substitute by striking out the words "at Tybee Island or Cockspur Island, in the State of Georgia."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] who has just spoken has laid considerable stress upon the memorial of the citizens of Savannah and upon the indorsement added thereto by the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. Now, had it been known to anybody interested in Port Royal that this officer had given such an opinion steps would have been taken to obtain the opinions of officers of the Navy and of the Coast Survey, equally competent to give an opinion in regard to the comparative merits of the two places, Tybee Island and Port Royal.

If this opinion, however, be correct, and if according to the information received by the gentleman from Georgia the Secretary of the Navy thinks it proper to establish a naval rendezvous at Tybee Island, why was Port Royal selected over a year ago in preference to Tybee Island by the Secretary of the Navy? The facts stated in Commodore Ammen's communications were as well known then as they are now. The truth is that those who know more about the two places than Commodore Ammen differed in opinion from him then as they do now. Port Royal was selected because in the opinion of almost every competent authorityit afforded superior advantages as a naval station to Tybee Island or any other place on the South Atlantic coast.

Upon an examination of the Savannah memorial, which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] presented last Friday in justification of the action of the committee, and to which the other gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] has alluded to-day, we find in the latter portion of it the real reason why the memorialists seek to have the rendezvous now established at Port Royal removed to Tybee Island. It is, in the very words of the memorial, "the fear that such outlays will necessarily result in the establishment of a growing commerce at that port, (that is, Port Royal,) to the serious and lasting detriment of the commerce of the city of Savannah and other ports in the State of Georgia.

Jealousy of Port Royal and fear of it as a growing commercial port alone actuate the Savannah memorialists in asking the change. It is to be hoped that such considerations will have no weight whatever with this House. These Savannah memorialists, while admitting that the harbor of Port Royal affords an advantage for floating a larger number of vessels than any other harbor on the South Atlantic coast, claim that "this advantage is overcome by other considerations of greater value."

The first of these considerations is the fact "that Port Royal is wholly undefended by fortifications," while "the port of Savannah is protected by Fort Pulaski." What protection Fort Pulaski affords may be best understood by the fact that during the late civil war batteries were erected by the Union forces all around it almost without the knowledge of the garrison, and that in thirty hours after the first gun was fired against it it surrendered, notwithstanding it was well garrisoned and fully supplied. But, admitting that Fort Pulaski may be a protection to the city of Savannah, what possible protection can it be to Tybee Island, where it is now sought to establish a naval station? Remember that during the war when thoroughly garrisoned it was unable to prevent the Union forces from erecting a single battery on Tybee Island. In fact, as I have already stated, batteries were erected on Tybee Island without the garrison in Fort Pulaski even being aware of their location until after they had opened fire upon the fort. That Fort Pulaski is no protection to Tybee Island seems to be partially admitted by these Savannah gentlemen when they state "that the Government holds two hundred and ten acres of land on Tybee Island, intended for the site of additional fortifications." What need for additional fortifications if Fort Pulaski affords ample protection? As an offset, however, to these two hundred and ten acres on Tybee Island, the Government owns five hundred and twenty acres at Port Royal, and the natural advantages of Port Royal are such that it requires much less expensive and less extensive fortifications for the defense of the harbor there than at Tybee Island. In this respect, therefore, Tybee Island possesses no advantages over Port Royal worth considering. In fact it is very questionable whether any fortifications are needed at all for the protection of a naval rendezvous. Certainly they are not needed now, and will not be, perhaps, for years.

It is further claimed that "the Government already owns ample available land accommodations in Savannah Harbor for the purposes of a naval station, namely, the whole of Cockspur Island, on which Fort Pulaski rests, and two hundred and ten acres of land on Tybee Island." If this be a matter of any importance in the decision of this question, then Port Royal possesses superior advantages in this respect, for the Government owns two hundred acres on Hilton Head and three hundred and twenty acres on Bay Point, or three hundred and ten acres more than it possesses in Savannah Harbor. As to Cockspur Island, on which Fort Pulaski rests, it is nothing but a marsh island with very little solid ground except that upon which the fort rests. Moreover, it is an exceedingly unhealthy spot, as is clearly shown in the following extracts from a report by Surgeons T. N. Roberts and J. N. Niles, United States Army, and therefore unfit, never mind what may be its other advantages for a naval station:

In its present condition the island is constantly overflowed, in a large part of its extent, by the tides, while the water from the rain-fall settles into the low spots of marshy ground and becomes stagnant. There is an abundant generation of malaria in those low places, which causes the different forms of paludal fever prevailing here during the hot season. This cause (malaria) would operate here with much greater intensity were the miasma not carried off or greatly diluted by the breezes from the sea.

The difficulty and expense of obtaining fresh water for drinking purposes at Port Royal is urged as an additional reason why the naval rendezvous should be removed from there to Tybee Island. Over a year ago when the naval rendezvous was first established at Port Royal this objection might have been urged with some force; but all difficulties of that kind have been removed, as will readily be perceived by a perusal of the following extract from the sanitary report of the surgeon of the fleet now at Port Royal:

Sanitary report North Atlantic fleet, 1875.

* * * Port Royal Sound having been made the rendezvous for the fleet, several vessels have been permanently located there, and it has been visited by nearly all. The advantages of the position of these waters for the purpose designated are very obvious. The winter is mild, and the heat of the summer months is tempered by almost uninterrupted sea-breezes. Facilities for living are excellent, and there is daily communication by rail with Savannah, Charleston, and Augusta.

The question of a supply of water for the fleet became one of great importance, especially during the summer months, when the annoyance and bad effect of the extreme heat occasioned by the fires necessary for the purpose of condensing water became very apparent. Several ineffectual attempts to obtain good water were made, and after leaving Port Royal I requested Surgeon J. C. Spear to devote special attention to the subject; to make thorough examinations of all water that could be supplied in sufficient quantity from the vicinity. The letter of Dr. Spear, which is appended, shows that the desired result has been obtained; that an adequate supply of excellent water exists in the immediate vicinity of Port Royal. At my request Dr. Spear has also prepared tables of temperature and relative humidity, which are of great value, as are the statements in his able sanitary report, all of which papers are appended.

It will be seen that the region is peculiarly healthy; that in a sanitary point of view it compares most favorably with any other portion of the coast.

* * * * * * *

S. F. COUES,
Surgeon of the Fleet.

The following is the report of Dr. Spear referred to in Surgeon Coues's report:

UNITED STATES STEAMER DICTATOR, SECOND RATE,
Port Royal, S. C., September 30, 1875.

SIR: I respectfully report that in July the water contractor, Mr. D. H Small, discovered near Beaufort, South Carolina, a source of water supply for vessels of war rendezvousing here. It is a spring on Albert Gotha Creek, a tributary of Beaufort River, five miles above the town of Beaufort. The water flows from a wooded hillside, composed of clean, white sand. It is very clear and cool, is agreeable to the taste, and contains very little organic matter. The Dictator, Pawnee, and Pinta have used it two months, and all agree that it is wholesome, keeps well in tank, and is in every respect much better than the water we formerly had from Charleston. The contractor, since leasing the spring, has built a small sediment tank of brick and Roman cement and a large receiving-tank with a capacity of nine thousand one hundred and thirty gallons. He has also put up iron pipe for a distance of one hundred and fifty-six feet, to connect the receiving-tank with the water-boat in the creek below. The spring has now a capacity of nineteen thousand gallons daily, and in the rainy season it will probably be more. At high tide a vessel drawing seven feet can reach the spring and load in time to get out on the next high tide.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. SPEAR,
Surgeon United States Navy.

Medical Inspector SAMUEL F. COUES, U. S. N.,
Fleet Surgeon, North Atlantic Station.

These two papers prove clearly that an adequate supply of fresh water can be obtained at Port Royal, and it is reasonable to infer that the expense of obtaining it is considerably reduced from what it was when it had to be brought from Charleston, a distance of seventy-five miles. The estimate therefore that, "with the force now making rendezvous at Port Royal, the cost for drinking-water will not be less than $100,000 yearly" is based upon a state of facts that no longer exists, and upon difficulties that have long since been removed. That fresh water cannot be obtained at any port for vessels without some expense is a fact beyond dispute. I think I have fully met the objections to Port Royal upon the water question. But supposing these objections to be still true, does the port of Savannah afford any superior advantages in this respect? I think not. At any rate, let us see. It is stated by Commodore Ammen, who seems to differ in regard to the comparative merits of Port Royal and Tybee Island as a naval rendezvous with almost every naval officer connected with the North Atlantic squadron, and with almost every Army officer who has any knowledge of the two places, that "pure fresh water is found at all seasons of the year at the head of Elba Island, or at a distance of about ten miles from the entrance of the river, and several miles lower down during a considerable part of the year."

Admitting that the water obtained at the head of Elba Island is of a character fitted for naval use, pure, wholesome, and keeps well in tanks, equal in every respect to the water at Port Royal, can it be obtained at any less expense than that procured at Port Royal? Certainly not, for the depth of water in the Savannah River at Elba Island is not sufficient at any stage of the tides to permit vessels of heavy draught like the Wabash and others now stationed at Port Royal to cross the bar at Elba Island and reach the head of the island where this pure fresh water can be obtained, so that it will have to be brought to them in the same manner as at Port Royal. In this respect, therefore, Elba Island affords no advantage over Port Royal in the facilities for obtaining water; in both places it must be carried to the fleet. In proof of my assertion in regard to the depth of water in the river at Elba Island, I hold in my hands a communication from Captain Patterson, superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, in which, in answer to certain inquiries from me, he states that the depth of water on the bar at the lower end of Elba Island is eleven feet at mean low water and seventeen and three-fourths feet at mean high water, while on the bar at the middle of the island, which bar must of course be crossed in order to reach the head of the island, the depth of water is only nine feet at mean low water and fifteen and three-fourths feet at mean high water.

As to the water lower down the river, in the neighborhood of Cockspur Island, nothing need be said in addition to what is contained in the report of Assistant Surgeons Roberts and Niles. These gentlemen state:

The water of the river in this vicinity is generally brackish. This condition is modified by the state of the river and the tides, being almost fresh when the former is overflowed by rains from the up country, and quite salt at high tides and a low state of the river. This evidently affects the evolution of malaria, the freshened current, in a high state of the river, saturating the soil almost to the surface, which, upon the subsiding of the water, is left exposed to the heat of the sun, producing the forms of paludal fever more incidental to interior fresh-water streams and swamps.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have sufficiently discussed the claims of Tybee Island, so far as relate to its superior advantages over Port Royal as a place for a naval rendezvous. A few words in regard to its claim to equal advantages with Port Royal and I am through. It is asserted that Port Royal possesses no superior advantage in depth of water over Savannah, "the depth of water," it is said, "over the entrance of Port Royal and Savannah being the same, namely, nineteen feet at mean low tide. In this respect, therefore, no superiority can be asserted for the former, each allowing vessels of the same draught." This statement, in mild language, is simply incorrect.

Referring again to the communication from Captain Patterson, I find that while the depth of water in the Savannah River at the outer bar is eighteen and one-half feet at mean low water, yet on the inner bar below the deep anchorage at the north end of Tybee Island, the depth of water is only seventeen feet at mean low water. As this inner bar has to be crossed in order to reach the anchorage intended for the fleet, the eighteen and one-half feet on the outer bar is of no importance whatever, since there is only seventeen feet on the inner bar. On the other hand, the depth of water at Port Royal entrance at mean low water is twenty-one feet or two and one-half feet more than on the outer bar at Savannah and four feet more than on the inner bar, while vessels can go up the Beaufort River to Battery Creek, which is twenty miles from Port Royal entrance and four miles above the present anchorage of the fleet, and find at the bar on the mouth of that creek nineteen feet at mean low water, or one-half foot more water than is found on the outer bar at Savannah.

UNITED STATES COAST SURVEY OFFICE,
Washington, May 18, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in appending below the information called for by your note of yesterday.

First. Depth on bar at Port Royal entrance (outer bar) at mean low water, twenty-one feet; at mean high water, twenty-seven and three-fourths feet.

Second. Depth that can be taken up to Battery Creek, Beaufort River, at mean low water, nineteen feet; at mean high water, twenty-five and one-half feet. Note that the least depth just stated is on a narrow bar near the mouth of Battery Creek; but the water is several feet deeper inside of it.

Third. Depth on bar at Tybee entrance (this refers to the outer bar Savannah River) at mean low water, eighteen and one-half feet; at mean high water, twenty-five and one-half feet. Depth on inner bar below the deep anchorage at north end of Tybee Island, at mean low water, seventeen feet; at mean high water, twenty-four feet.

Fourth. Depth of water on each side of Cockspur Island on the bar of the channel leading to north side of the island, twelve feet at mean low water, and at mean high water, nineteen feet. On the bar leading to the south side of the island, at mean low water, eight and one-half feet; mean high water, fifteen and one-half feet; there being a depth of from eighteen to twenty-nine feet at mean low water inside and abreast the east end of the island.

Fifth. Depth of water in Savannah River up to Elba Island, on the bar at lower end of the island, eleven feet at mean low water; seventeen and three-fourths feet at mean high water; on the bar at the middle of the island, nine feet at mean low water and fifteen and three-fourths feet at mean high water.

For the "comparative merits of Port Royal Sound and Tybee Roads as a sheltered anchorage for large-draught vessels," I beg leave to refer you to the chart sent herewith, upon which both anchorages are given on the same scale.

Yours respectfully,

C. P. PATTERSON,
Superintendent United States Coast Survey.

Hon. E. W. M. MACKEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] who reported this bill saw fit in his last remarks to make an attack upon the Committee on Naval Affairs by asserting that in the measures proposed to this House as amendments we had failed to meet the wants of the country.

Mr. BLOUNT. I attacked the measure, not the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. It is the same thing.

Mr. BLOUNT. If the gentleman chooses to make a personal matter of it, I cannot help it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, yesterday when the Committee on Naval Affairs, through its chairman, submitted to the House a measure perfectly just in itself, the most effectual and important measure that has been brought before this House in the line of economy and reform, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the champion of reform, was found voting against this measure.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman certainly does not refer to me.

Mr. LEWIS. I mean the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] the chairman of the subcommittee. I admit that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] voted for that amendment; but the gentleman who made the attack on the Naval Committee voted against that measure, reducing in only a small ratio the pay of the Navy.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to remind the gentleman that I also as a member of the Committee on Appropriations voted for the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I am speaking of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is dealing with me entirely. I hope he will be permitted to go on.

Mr. LEWIS. The gentleman is the champion of the bill before the House; and it was he who made the attack upon us.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Committee on Appropriations will allow the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will not reflect in that way upon the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LEWIS. They have reflected upon us.

Mr. Chairman, the measure which we reported was in the direction of reform. If the reduction of pay which we reported had been adopted, the purchasing power of the salaries of the officers of the Navy would be as great to-day as from 1865 down to the time when the panic began. There was nothing unjust in that measure. It did away with the odious system of promotion which has been filling up the retired-list, making that list more repugnant to the spirit and genius of our Government than the civil-pension lists of Great Britain. The democratic side of this House, trying to pursue the line of retrenchment and reform, reported this measure through the Naval Committee; but it was killed in the House of its friends.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] be adopted, then until those reports come in every navy-yard in the United States will be at the mercy of the Secretary of the Navy. He is not friendly to many of the navy-yards. He has blows to give as well as blows to take in a rencontre which he has assumed to be personal to himself. If you adopt this amendment, you leave this whole matter in the hands of a naval board composed of men whose lives have been spent upon the sea, who are not acquainted with the business affairs of life, who in the presence of the great elements of nature have been unfitted in their habits of mind to deal with such a question as the sale of navy-yards, involving millions upon millions of property belonging to the people of the country. There is nothing wise, nothing judicious in this measure. It is simply evasion—a shirking of responsibility which this House ought to meet now. You have the necessary facts to do so. You have more facts upon this question than upon any question of like nature which has been discussed during this whole session.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the substitute proposed by Mr. RANDALL for the amendment of Mr. LEWIS, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 97, noes 34.

The amendment of Mr. LEWIS, as amended by the substitution of the amendment of Mr. RANDALL, was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compass-fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ships' compasses, to be made in the navy-yards, $4,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out the words "to be made in the navy-yards, $4,000," and inserting "$3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For musical instruments and music for vessels of war, $500.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend by striking out "$500" and "inserting "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

For equipment of vessels: For coal for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation; storage, labor, hemp, wire, and other materials for the manufacture of rope; hides, cordage, canvas, leather; iron for manufacture of cables, anchors, and galleys; condensing and boat-detaching apparatus; cables, anchors, furniture, hose, bake-ovens, and cooking-stoves; life-rafts for monitors; heating-apparatus for receiving-ships; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels and manufacture of articles in the several navy-yards, $1,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$1,000,000" and inserting "$970,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, namely: For expenses of recruiting and fitting up receiving-ships, freight, and transportation of stores, transportation of enlisted men, printing, advertising, telegraphing, books and models, stationery, express charges, internal alterations, fixtures, and appliances in equipment buildings at navy-yards, foreign postage, car tickets, ferriage, and ice, apprehension of deserters, assistance to vessels in distress, continuous-service certificates and good-conduct badges for enlisted men, including purchase of school-books for training-ships, $45,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$45,000" and inserting "$75,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:

For provisions for the officers, seamen, and marines, $930,000.

For purchase of water for ships, $30,000.

For contingent expenses: For freight and transportation to foreign and home stations; candles and fuel; interior alterations and fixtures in inspection buildings; tools, and repairing same at eight inspections; special watchmen in eight inspections; books and blanks; stationery; telegrams; advertising; postage and express charges; tolls, ferriages, and car tickets; ice; and incidental labor not chargeable to other appropriations, $30,000

Mr. BLOUNT. I move in line 257 to strike out "30" and insert "25;" so it will read:

For the purchase of water for ships, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. I also move, in line 265, to strike out "30" and insert "35."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

For preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of materials; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and for general care and protection of the Navy in the line of construction and repair; incidental expenses, namely, advertising and foreign postage, $1,500,000.

Mr. MILLS. I move, at the end of line 274, to add the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the sum of $200,000 of the above sum, or as much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in the employment of labor to put the live-oak timber in the different yards in wet-docks; and labor for that purpose shall be employed during the months of July, August, or September, and shall be discharged before the 1st of October, 1876; and during the months of October and November, 1876, there shall not be exceeding fifty persons borne on the list as laborers at any navy-yard at the expense of the Government.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, during the examination made by the Committee on Naval Affairs at the different navy-yards of the United States, as far as they went, they have discovered the fact that a large amount of live-oak which the Government has been purchasing for a number of years is lying in these yards in an exposed condition. It is a peculiar kind of timber, and if exposed to extreme heat or cold cracks and in the course of a few years deteriorates, and in some instances becomes ruined. We found at the Boston navy-yard and in a number of other navy-yards a large amount of this timber lying out exposed in those yards without cover. It is best preserved in water, and when we asked the officers why it was not in water the answer was uniformly they did not have the labor to put it in water and take care of it.

Now, it makes no difference what amount of appropriation is made for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, it will be diverted from this labor and carried forward to employ writers and clerks and political laborers who may be employed on the eve of an election, and the timber of the Government will be allowed to go to ruin and become destroyed. I simply make a provision in this amendment that $200,000 out of the sum appropriated, and not in addition to it, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used in the employment of labor to put this live-oak timber into wet-docks.

I further provide that this extra labor, if it shall be required, shall be employed during the months of July, August, or September, in order that there may be no pretext for the Navy Department to wait until October and November, and then employ a thousand or more hands, as they did in 1874, because the Administration desired the election of Messrs. Gooch and Frost, as was stated in one of the dispatches to the commandant of the navy-yard at Boston. I wish the hands employed to do this labor employed in the interest of the Government, taking care of this live-oak timber, and not employed in the interest of some political party.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, this proposition has not been submitted to our committee. It meets with my approval, and no doubt has been carefully considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, for the reason that it is here without discussion and without knowledge, setting ourselves up as knowing enough on this subject of live-oak timber and its treatment to instruct the Navy Department as to its management. I know the accumulation of live-oak, its preservation and care, is a matter the Navy Department has given especial attention to, and that it has already brought up the stock on hand, to be used whenever the emergency shall arise, almost to the figure of the amount accumulated before the war. I ask attention to this statement:

Statement of live-oak, white oak, and yellow pine on hand at the United States navy-yards under cognizance of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Material.	1860.	1876.
	Cubic feet.	Cubic feet.
Live-oak	1,691,953	1,259,932
White oak	499,932	379,375
White oak, plank	3,364,658
Yellow pine	419,516	630,308
Yellow pine, plank	1,769,576

Now as to the other proposition in this amendment, that the Department shall be obliged on our say-so to have in certain months of the year—the hot months of the year, when you can labor to less advantage—the most men in the yards, and in certain other months it shall have the fewest men, I do not think we can afford to adopt it.

The gentleman talks, and I have heard it before, about political influence. He claims these yards are used for political purposes by the party now in power. In answer to him, I ask the Clerk to read from the Congressional Globe on this very matter for the information of the gentleman from Texas, who talks on this subject of the abuse of navy-yards for political purposes. They are the remarks of General BANKS in reference to the management of a navy-yard in New England.

The Clerk read as follows:

The order that was issued, which was a very proper one, as the gentleman from New Hampshire says, was the voluntary act of the Secretary of the Navy himself. No portion of the republicans of Charlestown asked for it. On the contrary, both sections of the republican party there regarded it as unsatisfactory. But the Secretary believed it was the proper rule to be enforced, and which had been enforced in the management of that and all other yards. I myself advised him to do it, and it was issued. So far as the management of the navy-yard at Charlestown is concerned, I say now what I have said here before, that democrats have more influence and power over it than any members of the republican party I know ever had. It is twenty years since I first represented this important interest in Congress, and in all that time, whether under democratic or republican rule, I have never had any considerable influence in its management. Democrats out of Congress, and apparently out of power, have sometimes kindly volunteered to aid me if I wanted to get a fellow or two employed there, and secretaries of the Department have said to me that without the most careful observation, under republican administrations, all the yards were sure to be filled with democrats.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. In the investigation by the Committee on Naval Affairs on the subject of the storage of live-oak in the three navy-yards of Brooklyn, Philadelphia, and Boston, this fact was clearly developed, that all the live-oak timber received at these yards—very little of it having been received at Philadelphia—within one year is lying there unprotected either by covering or by being put into the wet-docks. In Boston there is a very large amount of that timber lying exposed which has cost the Government a great sum of money and is very valuable. And it is very desirable, in my judgment, that there should be an appropriation somewhere in order that it may be properly taken charge of.

The answer made to us on every occasion when the question was asked why this lumber was suffered to lie unprotected in that way was, "The appropriation is exhausted; it cannot be done, for we have no labor."

Now, so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Texas relates to the using of a portion of the appropriation for that purpose, it is entirely proper, and I hope no gentleman will undertake to oppose it. It ought to be done. I think, however, the gentleman might modify the amendment and leave this matter completely in the hands of the officers of the yards who are now so anxious to take care of this timber. And there is no occasion on this subject to speak of the possibility or danger of political appointments. It is only to employ a few common laborers who can handle that lumber and throw it into the wet-docks. It seems to me the amendment is a very proper one.

Mr. BANKS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MILLS. I withdraw my amendment if the gentleman from Massachusetts will renew it.

Mr. BANKS. I renew the amendment. I owe my thanks to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for having that passage from one of my speeches, as I suppose it is, read. I did not know I had so much sense. [Laughter.] Every word of that statement is true. I never had any power in the navy-yards. There were always other people more influential with the officers there not connected with the Administration than I was or than any of my friends were.

Mr. Chairman, my earnest endeavor in the last twenty years, during which I have been off and on a Representative of that district, was to separate the navy-yard from all political influence; and again and again we have passed a declaration in the form of law that the chief workmen in the departments there should be men skilled in their business from civil life, and that they should make no appointments upon political grounds. That was the character of the order which the Secretary issued upon my recommendation, and, if I recollect rightly, substantially upon the declarations that I have made in this House.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine especially to another fact which will show to the House more conclusively than anything in the speech which has been read that the republicans have not had their due share of power there. In 1874 I was a candidate, as I have been several times, in that district, and it was an animated contest. I think more than twenty or thirty, possibly forty, of the most distinguished statesmen from the State of Maine came up there to influence that election, the late honorable Speaker of this House at their head. They were there for weeks. There had been more than two thousand republicans put in there. The affair, it was supposed, was ready, cocked and primed, for these gentlemen to put in operation. But when the polls finally closed, although in a district where they had had 6,000 majority for several years, there was a majority of 6,500 against them; and it appeared that these twenty or thirty or forty of the most prominent republicans from the State of Maine had not the slightest influence or power with a single Bureau in that yard.

Mr. BANKS. Just one word more, because I have had to speak on both sides. [Laughter.] It is not every one who can do that. I have advocated earnestly and strongly, because I knew it was for the interests of the Government and for my interests, and I want to put in a word on both sides, that the heads of the Bureaus, that the superintendents of the workmen, should be men chosen from civil life, skilled in their profession, and without the right to make appointments of men merely for political purposes and without regard to the interests of the Government.

In the Senate of the United States and in committees of conference we had every strong point made there, and the last opponent that I met, who opposed entirely the organization of the yards on this ground, was one of the most prominent democrats of the country, himself named not long ago as a candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. MILLS. By a rule of law of universal recognition, and which the gentleman from Maine as a lawyer will certainly understand, no man is permitted to manufacture testimony for himself. He has brought in the saying of a gentleman of his own party. It is mere hearsay testimony, and ought not to be taken; but even if I should waive all objection to his witness and the competency of his testimony, I must say that I think he has been exceedingly unfortunate in the selection of his witness, for the House has come to the conclusion by this time that his witness has turned back on him.

When we were at Boston investigating the condition of the navy-yard at that place, we discovered that in the months of October and November, I think, over one thousand hands were put on at that yard to work under the following delightful epistle:

Private.] BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS, October 23, 1874.

MY DEAR COMMODORE: I wish you would approve requisitions for men to be employed as they may be made until the 1st of November.

Some fifty additional men has allowed from the Chelsea district, and I suppose some more will be required from Gooch's district.

The Administration desire the success of Gooch and FROST.

Yours respectfully,

I. HANSCOM.

Commodore E. T. NICHOLS, U. S. N.,
Commandant.

Now, sir, about one thousand hands were employed under that order to cut down the hull of the steamship Virginia, an old vessel commenced in 1816, and that has the most magnificent hull of live-oak timber of the very best quality in the United States Navy, officers of the Navy say as sound and hard as rock, and the work done cost the Government I suppose eight or ten thousand dollars in the injury to the vessel, but the expenses to the Treasury for the payment of hands amounted to over $100,000. One hundred thousand dollars of the treasure of the Government of the United States, if you will allow me to discard poetry and speak in the language of truth and fact, was embezzled by the officers of the Government to elect two gentlemen to Congress who were agreeable to the taste of the Administration; and I will say in praise of the gentleman from Massachusetts that all the energies of the Administration, all the sinews of its power in that yard, all the influence of $100,000 that was robbed from the Treasury to defeat him by putting men in the yard who would vote against him—notwithstanding all this, when the day of election came, so strong is his hold on the affections of the people of Massachusetts, that these men went to the polls to a man and cast their votes for him.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot dispute it, sir. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. MILLS; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move in lines 273 and 274 to strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$1,750,000," partly because by the amendment just adopted a designation has been made of $200,000 of the funds of the appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, and partly to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this appropriation as it stands at present is smaller than has been given to the Bureau of Construction and Repair for many years. One year previous to the war there was more expended than is now given. The committee has reported grudgingly only $1,500,000, and designation of $200,000 of that has already been made on motion of the gentleman from Texas. Last year's appropriations for this Bureau were $3,300,000. The committee has cut that down more than 50 per cent., a larger reduction than has been made in any other branch of the service.

Sir, this is the Bureau upon which is dependent the actual life and existence and maintenance of the Navy. All the repairs of the different ships on all waters of the globe are made by this Bureau, and any gentleman with any experience knows that you cannot maintain a navy even as small as ours without there being natural decay and destruction that involve a large amount of money for repairs. If my friends who are seeking to cut down this appropriation had ever been engaged in the merchant marine or had owned or sailed vessels, they would understand better the decay that is incurred by a vessel at sea.

Now, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that this House intends to cripple the American Navy. We have had evidence of it already. I do not think there is any disposition here on the part of the majority, so far as we can judge, to do this; but there is no surer way of impairing the efficiency of the American Navy and leaving it in a bad condition from year to year than unreasonably cutting down this appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Out of that appropriation during the last seven years the present Secretary of the Navy has kept up the Navy in its present condition and made it a better Navy than we ever had on the waters of the globe. He has now got it in good condition. I am free to say that he can get along with a less appropriation than he has had heretofore, and that is why I for one would consent to a large reduction. But when gentlemen want to cut the appropriation down from $3,300,000 to $1,500,000, and then designate $200,000 of that for a particular purpose, only leaving him $1,300,000—I say nothing of ships that cannot be completed for less than $1,000,000—he cannot maintain in their condition the vessels now to be found in our different squadrons in the different waters of the globe.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I shall undertake on a future occasion to take issue with the view of the gentleman from Maine that the Navy of the United States is now in a better condition than it was ever known to be. I shall undertake on that occasion to demonstrate, if possible, that the United States Navy has never been in so shameful and miserable a condition as at the present time.

Now, replying to the matters that are pertinent to the amendment, I desire, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is here, but I see he is absent——

Mr. RANDALL. I am here; I will listen.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire, then, to know from the Committee on Appropriations in so many words whether in the line of construction and repair that committee intends that the Bureau of Construction and Repair shall set about the building of new vessels?

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer that question. My understanding is that we have cut the appropriation down to a sum sufficient for repairs. In so far as iron-clads are concerned, there are fifteen now afloat and five to be finished.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then do I understand that the Committee on Appropriations intend to commit themselves to the work which the Secretary of the Navy has undertaken, under contracts with John Roach and others, for the repairing and building of iron vessels?

Mr. RANDALL. I see the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] now in his seat. If he had been here before, he would have been the proper one to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] I will say that so far as I know the Committee on Appropriations intend to commit themselves to nothing. We have cut down the appropriation for this purpose as far as we deemed it safe to cut it down. If the gentleman from Tennessee can make it manifest that we have not reduced it low enough, of course the committee ought to listen to him.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. My object in asking the question was this: I did not suppose that the Committee on Appropriations intended by any words which they might use to give sanction to what the Secretary of the Navy has done in the past in the way of repairing vessels and constructing new vessels.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer for myself in that connection: I do not know that I have the right to answer for anybody else. I condemn entirely the manner of repairing vessels, as it is called; really building new vessels, having nothing of the old but the names. We cut down this appropriation from $3,300,000 to $1,500,000, which is a pretty serious cut, unless we had justification for it, which I think we had.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. So far as I am a member of this House, I do not want that we shall commit ourselves by any indirection to the policy of authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to build new vessels. If Congress means that new vessels shall be built, let it say so and appropriate money accordingly; that is what I mean.

A word now in regard to the proposition to increase this appropriation from $1,500,000 to $1,750,000. There is absolutely no necessity for any increase, for the reason that there is now plenty of material on hand at the different navy-yards for all the repairing which the Government is likely to do for the next five or six years; I mean repairing solely. Hence the amount of money which you appropriate will be or ought to be expended solely for the labor required to repair the vessels of the United States Navy with the materials which we already have on hand. Hence the limitation put here by the Committee on Appropriations of $1,500,000 is ample for the purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of addressing myself to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] proposing to increase by $250,000 the appropriation recommended by the Committee on Appropriations for this branch of the service.

When the Committee on Appropriations came to this Bureau they felt impressed with the propriety of restraining the further practice under this Bureau which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] has stated now obtained, that of really building new vessels under the name of repairing vessels. They set out upon the inquiry, What is the legitimate expense of simply keeping the Navy in repair as understood in common parlance? We were informed that with $1,750,000 they could do that work and complete the five iron-clads that have been contracted for and are now in process of construction. We did not deem that the rapid completion of those iron-clads was a matter of any pressing importance; and we determined, therefore, to reduce the amount appropriated to $1,500,000. That amount will still permit the completion of these iron-clads within two years instead of one. I therefore can see no reason for increasing the sum, because there is really no necessity for the present completion of these iron-clads.

My colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. HALE,] without stating anything tangible, without giving us any definite information, states generally that persons not familiar with these things cannot conceive of the expense attending naval affairs. Now, while my own judgment and information on that subject were deficient at the outset, I think I have had from the Department enough information to justify me in the conclusion that the amount proposed by the Committee on Appropriations is sufficient. I hope, therefore, that the Committee of the Whole will reject the proposition to increase this appropriation, especially as the care of the timber is one of the items of expenditure under this Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. DANFORD. In answer to the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that, in his judgment, our Navy is to-day in a worse condition than it ever was at any previous time in our history, I desire to say that the ships of our Navy, as shown by the reports of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, are to-day undoubtedly in a better condition than they were when this Administration came into power, if we are to place any reliance whatever upon those reports.

If my colleague on the committee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] speaks of our Navy in comparison with the navies of the great powers of the world, then it becomes a question of judgment and opinion whether the Navy of the United States is now in a comparatively worse condition than it ever was before at any time in our history.

The policy of the great powers of the world in relation to the construction of navies has not yet been fully determined. While Great Britain within the last thirty days has launched at least two iron-clads with twenty-four-inch armor, we hear on the other hand that Herr Krupp is prepared to build a gun of one hundred and fifty tons that will throw a projectile which will crush in the sides of those iron-clads as the six-pound shot of thirty years ago crushed through the sides of the wooden vessels of the navies of the world of that day.

We have no settled or fixed policy in this country in relation to the construction of ships. I concede that; and when Congress a few years ago made a provision for the increase of our Navy, appropriating for that purpose I believe $3,500,000, it was provided that the Secretary of the Navy should construct from that appropriation eight vessels. Sir, that sum would not construct two such vessels as France and Great Britain are putting afloat. But in regard to such vessels as we have, such vessels as we had when this Administration came into power, such vessels as it has been the policy of the Secretary of the Navy and the present Administration to construct, the reports of the Secretary of the Navy and of the heads of the Bureaus show that they are in far better condition than they were six years ago. Take our cruisers, for instance. We had at that time but eight cruising vessels in good condition. At the time of the last report we had twenty-six. Of receiving-ships we had but one in tolerable condition. At this time we have three in good condition. So with other classes of vessels; they have been improved in condition; and many vessels which during the war were hurriedly constructed of green timber have been rebuilt of live-oak, and are now substantial vessels. In this connection I desire to publish some data furnished by the Bureau upon the present condition of the Navy.

The question being taken on the pro forma amendment, it was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. HALE.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I wish to say something upon the complaint which has been made in regard to the present Secretary of the Navy having, out of these annual appropriations for construction and repair, actually rebuilt what amount to new vessels. This is a complaint which has been sent abroad far and wide as if it were a gross abuse, and as if it were a new thing. Here, by the way, let me say that when most of the charges against the Navy Department are boiled down so that we may see what they really mean they amount to this: that out of these annual appropriations the Secretary of the Navy has actually been able to repair and build up a new and good Navy. Now, Mr. Chairman, there may have been some stretch of power in that; but it has not been in the direction of wastefulness or extravagance or of the decline of the Navy, but the other way.

But, Mr. Chairman, in regard to the rebuilding of ships in the Navy out of the fund for construction and repair, it is a thing that has always been done. The name of the ship is retained; but, instead of actually repairing her, she is practically rebuilt from the bottom. This, however, adds no ship to the Navy; it does not increase our naval force in numbers. I have here a list of a few of the vessels which in years past have been rebuilt in this way: the United States, in 1850; Fulton, 1835; Engineer, 1835; Princeton, 1851; Constitution, 1853; Constellation, 1853; Congress, rebuilt 1840, broken up at Norfolk 1836; Macedonian, rebuilt 1852; Franklin, 1854.

All these things were done in the olden days. Gentlemen need not set up this cry of abuse. Nay, sir, more than that; in 1843, out of the regular annual appropriations for the Navy, the sloops Portsmouth, Germantown, Albany, Plymouth, St. Mary, and Jamestown were built outright as new ships. They were not merely built over old names of the vessels then existing in the navy-yard; but without authority or leave or knowledge on the part of Congress the then administration proceeded to add to the Navy these six new ships out of the annual appropriation for construction and repair.

The Secretary of the Navy in this as in other things has guarded well to see that the Navy should be kept up, that the money Congress furnished him instead of being wastefully and extravagantly spent should be put upon the Navy itself so that something might show for it. If the gentleman states that the American Navy is poorer than ever before, I take square and direct issue with him, for both in wooden and iron vessels, in sailing and steam vessels, the present Secretary of the Navy has built up and maintained such a force as we never had before in the history of the Government. There are to-day fifteen iron-clad ships ready for immediate use if war should break upon the horizon, and when he came in there were not three which could go out of any one of our harbors and be prevented from going to the bottom. He has spent only a percentage of what they originally cost, and to-day as compared with any other power they make us a formidable people.

Mr. BEEBE. My attention was attracted by the remarks of the gentleman from Maine. I understood him to instance cases where vessels had been repaired, but I do not understand that he instanced any case since 1861. I would inquire whether he has upon his list any case since then?

Mr. HALE. The cases complained of by the gentleman on that side are since 1861.

Mr. BEEBE. Precisely; but we find in the Revised Statutes this section:

SEC. 1538. Not more than $3,000 shall be expended at any navy-yard in repairing the hull and spars of any vessel, until the necessity and expediency of such repairs and the probable cost thereof are ascertained and reported to the Navy Department by an examining board, which shall be composed of one captain or commander in the Navy, designated by the Secretary of the Navy, the naval constructor of the yard where such vessel may be ordered for repairs, and two master-workmen of said yard, or one master-workman and an engineer of the Navy, according to the nature of the repairs to be made. Said master-workmen and engineer shall be designated by the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repair.

Mr. HALE. That has always been complied with.

Mr. BEEBE. I understand not. From the investigation which we have been giving to this in the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department we find instances where repairs have been made without compliance with the requirements of the Revised Statutes. Now, sir, it is not my purpose to engage in the discussion of this bill at all, nor did I have that intention when I rose. I merely desired to call the attention of the committee to the fact that since the time instanced by the gentleman from Maine we have had a provision of the Revised Statutes incorporated in the general system of our laws which should be strictly complied with by those in charge of this great Department of our Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HALE's amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Academy:

For pay of professors and others: For one professor of drawing, (head of department,) $2,500; three professors, namely, one of mathematics, (assistant,) one of chemistry, and one of French, at $2,200 each; eleven assistant professors, namely, four of French, one of Spanish, three of English studies, history, and law, one of mathematics, and two of drawing, at $1,800 each; sword-master, at $1,500, and two assistants, at $1,000 each; boxing-master and gymnast, at $1,200; and assistant librarian, at $1,400; three clerks to Superintendent, at $1,200, $1,000, and $800, respectively; one clerk to commandant of cadets, $1,000; one clerk to paymaster, $1,000; one apothecary, $750; one commissary, $288; one cook, $425.50; one messenger to Superintendent, $600; one armorer, $529.50; one gunner's mate, $469.50; and one quarter-gunner, $469.50; one cockswain, $469.50; three seamen in the department of seamanship, at $349.50 each; one band-master, $528; eighteen first-class musicians, at $348 each; seven second-class musicians, at $300 each; two drummers and one fifer, (first class,) at $348 each; in all, $54,826.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move on page 12, lines 284 and 285, to strike out all after the word "others" in line 284, down to and including the word "hundred" in line 285, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Two professors, (the heads of departments,) to wit, one of drawing, and one of English studies, history, and law, at $2,500 each, $5,000.

And on page 13, line 288, strike out the word "eleven," and insert "ten;" in line 289 strike out the word "three," and insert "two;" and in line 316, strike out "$54,826" and insert "$55,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Marine Corps:

For pay of officers of the Marine Corps, and for pay of non-commissioned officers, musicians, privates, and others of the corps, and for transportation of officers traveling without troops, and for payments to discharged soldiers for clothing undrawn, $500,000; and from and after the passage of this act there shall be no appointments to fill vacancies occurring in the list of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps until the number of such officers shall have been reduced, by casualties or otherwise, to seventy-five.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move on page 17, line 393, to strike out "500" and insert in lieu thereof "624;" so it will read "$624,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. I move to strike out from the word "and" in line 393, down to and including the words "75" in line 398, and in lieu thereof to insert the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Marine Corps of the United States shall consist of one commandant with the rank of colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, three majors, seventeen captains, twenty-two first lieutenants, twenty-two second lieutenants, one sergeant-major, one quartermaster-sergeant, one hundred and forty sergeants, one hundred and thirty-five corporals, and twelve hundred privates in time of peace, to be increased in time of war, at the discretion of the President, to any number not exceeding three thousand, with a corresponding increase of non-commissioned officers: Provided, That the commissions of officers now in the corps shall not be vacated by this act; but these officers holding staff appointments shall be retransferred to the line of the corps according to the date of commission, and no promotion or appointments to fill vacancies in the list of commissioned officers shall be made until the number of such officers shall have been reduced by casualties or otherwise to the number above provided in this section: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall preclude the advancement of any officer to a higher grade for distinguished conduct in conflict with the enemy or for extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession as is authorized by sections 1605 and 1607 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

That upon the settlements of accounts of the paymaster, quartermaster, and assistant quartermasters their offices shall cease to exist, and the duties now performed by them shall be transferred to the pay corps of the Navy, who shall perform said duties without any additional compensation.

That the adjutant and inspector shall be selected by the commandant from the grade of major or of captain for the term of three years only.

That upon the settlement of the accounts of the quartermaster, the barrack and other property now accounted for by him shall be transferred to the proper bureaus of the Navy.

That the allowance for forage for field-officers be abolished, unless such field-officer be actually serving with troops in the field.

That the band known as the "Marine Band" be abolished at once, mustered out of the service, the instruments sold, and the money turned into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That a sufficient number of musicians be retained, so that the number and grade of musicians of the corps shall be the same in all respects as the musicians of a regiment of infantry in the Army.

That in case any reduction is made by the present or any succeeding Congress in the pay of the officers of the Army, a corresponding reduction shall take place in the pay of the officers of the Marine Corps.

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment is so lengthy that it is impossible to discuss all its features in five minutes. But there are some prominent ones to which I shall call the attention of the committee, the only ones I presume which will encounter any opposition: the proposition to reduce the number of privates in the Marine Corps to twelve hundred and the proposition to abolish what is known as the staff of the Marine Corps.

The act of 1834 is the last act which can be found increasing the number of marines previous to the late war, except the act which provided for a Marine Corps at the time of the Mexican war, which act only operated during the war, after which the number was restored as it had existed previous to the war. Now, up to 1860, under the law, excepting the time during the Mexican war, the Marine Corps in all, officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, aggregated only twelve hundred and eighty-eight. In my amendment the aggregate number is fifteen hundred and ninety-five, making a difference of about three hundred in favor of the number provided for by my amendment over the number of the Corps as it existed in 1860. In 1860 we had as many ships requiring the presence of marines as we have now; we had as many navy-yards requiring the presence of marines as we have now; and there was no complaint prior to the war that this number was insufficient, although it was over three hundred less than it is now.

Our squadron service consisted of forty vessels in 1860. It consists now of only forty or forty-one. It is true that we have here, I suppose, for the purpose of influencing the opinions of foreign powers as to the importance of our Navy, a list of seventy ships of first, second, third, and fourth rates. But six of them when this report was furnished by the Secretary of the Navy were in process of construction; and if any one will take the list and examine it carefully he will find that there are thirty-seven of that number in which marines can be dispensed with. Here is a list which I have made of those vessels, showing the duties on which they are now placed, where they are laid up, where they are in ordinary, or where they are undergoing repairs.

Vessels of the first rate not in need of marines.

Colorado, receiving-ship at New York.
Minnesota, training-ship at New York.
Niagara, in ordinary at Boston.
Wabash, receiving-ship at Boston.

Vessels of second rate not in need of marines.

Connecticut, on stocks at Boston.
Florida, at New London.
Iowa, laid up at Boston.
Antietam, store-ship at League Island.
Delaware, in ordinary at New York.
Java, on the stocks at New York.
New York, on the stocks at New York.
Pennsylvania, on the stocks at Boston.
Susquehanna, in ordinary at New York.
Lancaster, laid up at Portsmouth.
Severn, in ordinary at New London.
Worcester, in ordinary at Norfolk.
Trenton, building at New York.
Benicia, laid up at Mare Island.
Ticonderoga, laid up at Portsmouth.
Canandaigua, in ordinary at Norfolk.
Shenandoah, in ordinary at New London.

Vessels of third rate not in need of marines.

Quinnebaug, repairing at Philadelphia.
Galena, repairing at Norfolk.
Iroquois, laid up at Mare Island.
Adams, building at Boston.
Enterprise, building at Portsmouth.
Essex, building at Boston.
Alliance, building at Norfolk.
Ranger, building at Wilmington.
Wachusett, laid up at Boston.
Mohican, repairing at Mare Island.
Wyoming, laid up at Washington.
Narragansett, at navy-yard Mare Island.
Kansas, laid up at Portsmouth.
Nipsic, repairing at Washington.
Nyack, in ordinary at Mare Island.
Wasp, condemned at Montevideo.

I state, then, that if we take the foreign squadrons as compared with the foreign squadrons before the war, or take the list of vessels in the United States Navy as given to us by the Secretary of the Navy, and deduct therefrom all ships in which marines may be dispensed with, we will find that the number does not exceed the number of ships which we had in commission before the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the reason urged by every naval officer for having a marine police on board ship? There is but one single reason substantial in its nature, and that is for the prevention of mutiny and for the discipline of sailors; in other words, to hold them in check, to prevent them, when they are far out at sea, when they exceed largely in number their officers, from taking control of the ship and mutinying against the officers, as has been done in many other navies as well as our own. I state that a force of twelve hundred is more than sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose a feature of the amendment which the gentleman from Alabama thinks is not an important one; it being, at any rate, one to which he has paid no attention in his remarks. It is that part which strikes at the Marine Band, which proposes to abolish this band. I oppose that part of the amendment from two motives; one purely æsthetic, and the other purely selfish. If I had time, I would like to dwell on the first motive. I would like to tell how in olden times, at Athens, those grand people considered music one of the great educators of youth; how wise fathers regularly carried their children to places where they could listen to the finest music; how they thought it not only ennobled the heart and purified the soul, but through them beautified the body. I would like to descant upon the beauty of the Athenian maid, the product of music, who stood in her naked loveliness before Praxiteles; and how the shapeless mass of Parian marble burst into the Venus de Medici. I would like to dwell upon the manly beauty of the young hero who stood before Phidias, and how his image sprang from the soulless marble into the godlike Apollo Belvedere. I would like to prove that the beauty of the models for these chefs-d'œuvre was due in a great measure to music. But, sir, I have not the time. So I will pass by this first motive, and shall confine my remarks to the other; especially as it will come home to the gentlemen on my side of the House more readily.

Mr. Chairman, for fifteen long dreary years at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue the White House has been occupied by a republican, and during the winter months, of evenings, the Marine Band has been up there at receptions to discourse sweet music for the delectation of a republican President, and for the delectation of his republican friends. At every reception a republican President has stood in a certain room receiving his guests, and his pet republican friends in white vests and white cravats have stood behind him enjoying the dulcet tones poured forth from the silver throats of silvered instruments by twenty-four gentlemen in scarlet coats. For long years, of summer Saturday afternoons, twenty-four gentlemen in scarlet coats have caused twenty-four silvered instruments, on the green in front of the White House, to belch forth martial music for the delectation of a republican President, and for the delectation of his republican friends.

On the 4th of next March, sir, there will be a democratic President in the White House. Sir, is the democratic President to have no music? [Laughter.] I have been up there at a presidential reception. I went in and I saw my friends from the other side enjoying the music. I went through a crowd of republicans with one hand on my watch-fob and the other on my wallet. I caught now and then the notes of the music, but I could not enjoy it. I was as a stranger in a strange land. I felt that I was one too many. But next year, sir, it will be different.

Mr. MILLIKEN. They will have their hands on their watch-fobs then. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. Very good; but we will be enjoying the music. [Laughter.] Why, sir, the other Saturday evening I was out in front of the White House among the canaille, the sans culottes, the men and children without breeches and shoes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Was it a democratic meeting? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. And there, on the south portico, sat the Chief Magistrate, the republican President, with his feet on the balustrade and his Partaga in his mouth listening to the Marine Band. His republican friends were about him. Their feet were on the balustrade of the south portico, wreaths of blue smoke curled up in balmy deliciousness from Partagas fresh from the Flowery Isle. I shook a mental fist in their mental faces, and whispered to myself that every dog had his day, and I asked myself, "Shall this be ever thusly?" And from deep down in my heart came a reply, "No! No! never!" I will see a democratic President in the White House. He shall receive his friends to the music of twenty-four silvered instruments, filled with the breath of twenty-four gentlemen in scarlet coats. The Marine Band shall play true democratic music for a democratic President, [laughter;] and out there on that south portico I want to see a democratic President sitting with his feet on the balustrade listening to the music poured forth by the Marine Band, and I hope to be one of his friends; and I will sit there with my feet on the balustrade enjoying one of his Partagas. But they wish to abolish the Marine Band. Think of this being done, democrats, before the democratic President goes into his position. We have many men who we feel are fit to fill that position. In my mind's eye I see them now marching on from Saint Louis to the White House. Let me name them as they come in sight. They come first from the East.

Why, there is one from the great Empire State who we know is greater than Alexander was, for Alexander only cut the Gordian knot with his sword; but the Gordian knot was made of nothing but a hempen string; but this man with his fist smashed a ring of adamantine steel, cut and destroyed the canal ring. He may be in the position, sir; and I want the Marine Band there to give him music. He is a man of purity, ay, of virginal purity. Perhaps he may wish to lead a bride into the White House. Shall we say the Marine Band shall not play for him the wedding march? Shall we refuse to let the Marine Band fill with sweet music the bridal chamber? Not by my vote. Never, sir! never! NEVER! [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois proceeding?

Mr. LEWIS. I must object.

[Cries of "O, no!" "O, no!"]

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out the last word, and yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. We have other men. There may be one from a smaller State who would grace the presidential chair as it has not been graced for long, long years past; one who in character as in name resembles the peerless knight who was sans peur et sans reproche. Sir, this almost faultless man may be there. Are you to deny him music from the Marine Band. Never, sir! never! NEVER! I will never consent by my vote. [Great laughter.]

We have them from Western States——

Mr. KELLEY. Bill Allen. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. From the Buckeye State one—a man who, at the other end of the Capitol, never speaks but he utters words of wisdom—who is ready on every subject and makes no mistakes. Are we to have no music for him other than that which he himself gives forth from a nasal instrument in his own red bandana? No, sir; never! never! NEVER! [Great laughter.]

Sir, we have a man from the Hoosier State, the old democratic warhorse, a great democratic leader, who, they say, is a little of a trimmer. If he is ever a trimmer or appears to be a trimmer, it is because his mind is so round that he sees both sides of a question and does not go wildly off on either side. [Laughter.] He may be in that position, and I may be his friend in the White House. Shall he have no music from the Marine Band? Never by my vote! Never! NEVER! [Laughter.]

From my own State, Mr. Chairman, there is a man who would fill the chair as it never was filled, not a single inch of it will not be filled; a great man in law and a great man in politics, who, if President, would never give a wrong decision. One against whom not a word can be said. When, sir, I shall come down from Illinois to be at his inaugural to receive him at the White House, shall we have no music to aid him in tripping the light fantastic toe? [Laughter.] Never, sir, by my vote will I consent to that; never! never! NEVER! [Laughter.]

Sir, there is another still; there is one from your own Keystone State, great in arms; great as a civilian; a man who, if he had not been a great general, would have been talked of for his great civil acquirements. He may be there and he will wish to have some memories of the past brought to his mind by martial music. Is it to be denied him? Shall the Marine Band be refused to him? Not by my vote; never! never! NEVER! [Great laughter.]

Then, sir, there is still another, the Great Unknown, coming ten thousand strong from every part of the Union, the Great Unknown of the democratic party.

A MEMBER. Parker?

Mr. HARRISON. No, sir; I will call no names. He is all around in the democratic party. It is full of the great unknown.

Mr. WILLARD. The great unknowing?

Mr. MILLIKEN. I suppose that delicacy prevents the gentleman from naming him.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; delicacy and modesty forbids me calling names. [Laughter.] Sir, when the Great Unknown gets here, shall he have no music; shall no tunes come from those twenty-four silver-throated instruments, blown out by these twenty-four gentlemen in red coats, to welcome him to the White House? Shall we have no music when we introduce him to the American people? Not by my vote. No, sir; never! never! NEVER! [Great laughter and applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LEWIS. When General Zeilin, the commandant of the Marine Corps, made his last report to the Secretary of the Navy, he stated that only about one-half of the entire force was then on board vessels in commission. When this Congress met last winter there was only about one-half the marine force then on board ships. We are now confronted with the statement that there are over one thousand marines on board of ships, and that the Department cannot possibly dispense with any of them. Previous to this session of Congress General Zeilin reported to the Secretary of the Navy that the number allowed by law, fifteen hundred, had been reduced by desertion and otherwise, and of those in the service not more than one-half were employed on board ship. Why has the number been increased to nearly eleven hundred at this time? No substantial reason can be given for it. They are put on receiving-ships, on instruction-ships, on store-ships, on ships lying in port and doing nothing. They are put on them in order to prevent the adoption of the amendment which has been proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

What necessity is there for marines on receiving-ships which are in port? The marines that are in barracks in those ports can defend the ships from any mutiny, should any be threatened. The sailors on board the ships have nothing to do, and the officers are not in danger of any mutiny, which is the only substantial reason for the employment of marines.

As I have already said, there are thirty-seven ships on our list upon which marines will not be needed. The number, twelve hundred, will give an ample marine force on board of ships, and at the same time furnish a sufficient number to assist watchmen in the different navy-yards in the preservation and protection of the public property.

It is not proposed by this amendment to vacate the commission of any officer in the Marine Corps. It is proposed only that when vacancies occur by death, by their own voluntary act of resignation or otherwise, those vacancies shall not be filled. No injustice is done to any officer of the corps.

Commodore Porter made a recommendation to the committee in regard to the re-organization of the Marine Corps. He proposed that it should have one colonel, one lieutenant-colonel, two majors, twenty captains, twenty-five first lieutenants, and twenty-five second lieutenants. We provide in our amendment the same number of field-officers, in fact giving one more major; and we provide for seventeen captains, which is a sufficient number, and for twenty-two first lieutenants, and for twenty-two second lieutenants.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was then taken upon the amendment moved by Mr. LEWIS; and upon a division there were—ayes 25, noes 70.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HARRISON and Mr. LEWIS were appointed.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman allow me to move to strike out so much as proposes to do away with the Marine Band?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now dividing, and no amendment is in order.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 25, noes not counted.

So the amendment of Mr. LEWIS was not agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill, with the amendments, to the House.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to offer an amendment and have a vote upon it.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That in case any reduction is made, by the present or any succeeding Congress, in the pay of the officers of the Army, a corresponding reduction shall take place in the pay of the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, who shall thereafter receive the same pay with the grades and rank in the Army with which they are assimilated by law.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make the point of order that we cannot now go back to the portion of the bill relating to the pay of the officers of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now insist upon my motion that the committee rise and report this bill, with the amendments, to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the SPEAKER pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. CLYMER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3375) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and to recommend that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended be passed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I now call the previous question upon the bill and the amendments thereto reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that if no separate vote is asked upon any of the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, they be concurred in in gross.

There was no objection; and the amendments were accordingly concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLOUNT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 708) for the relief of Hans C. Peterson; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As the committee to investigate the affairs in Louisiana, of which I am a member, will leave to-morrow, I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Louisiana investigating committee while in New Orleans have authority to take testimony by subcommittees in their discretion, and that the chairmen of such subcommittees be authorized to administer oaths to witnesses.

Mr. KASSON. I would call the attention of the gentleman to the question whether the House can by resolution authorize the chairman of a subcommittee to administer oaths.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been often done.

Mr. HARRISON. It has been done at this session.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are many precedents for it.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WIKE. I desire to introduce a resolution to enlarge the authority of the committee charged with the investigation of the conduct of Judge Wylie of this District.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object, and demand the regular order.

Mr. WIKE. I do not see why the gentleman should have any objection to this resolution. It is designed to facilitate an investigation already in progress; and it is presented upon the request of the committee.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. DARRALL, has resigned his place upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Maine, Mr. PLAISTED, to fill the vacancy thus created.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BLAIR for one week, and to Mr. KIMBALL for four days.

GOVERNMENT FARMS IN PRINCESS ANNE COUNTY, VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting reports of the Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General relative to the Government farms in Princess Anne County, Virginia, in 1864 and 1865; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I ask consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the regular order.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the Indian appropriation bill, and pending that motion I desire to consult the wish of the House as to the time that shall be allowed for general debate. If left to my own discretion, I would indicate two hours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to limiting general debate on the Indian appropriation bill to two hours?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is now open for general debate.

DISTRIBUTION OF GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with the remarks which I propose upon the distribution of the award made by the tribunal at Geneva for losses sustained by citizens of the United States, I ask the Clerk to read a paper which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, marine underwriters, owners of claims by reason of which the money paid by Great Britain was awarded by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, respectfully remonstrate against the passage of the House bill No. 2685, reported to the House of Representatives by Mr. LORD, from the Judiciary Committee. The proposed bill disregards the decisions and proceedings of the tribunal in the rejection and allowance of claims, denies or ignores the just rights of lawful owners of property the value of which entered into the award, and fails to satisfy the trust, duty, and obligation of the Government of the United States toward those upon or by reason of whose legal rights it obtained the award and collected the money. And the provision for admitting these rightful claimants to a share of a supposed surplus, after bestowal of the fund upon invalid and improperly preferred claims, which were wholly rejected by the tribunal and are necessarily indefinite in amount, does not in anywise obviate or correct the injustice.

Each of your petitioners, which is a mutual society, further respectfully protests against bestowal of the money of the society upon what are termed war-premium claimants, who do not embrace but a fragment of its dealers, and who do embrace strangers not dealing with it at all. Such a disposition of the money would not only be in disregard of just and legal right, but would violate the fundamental contract entitling each member to his just proportion of the common reclamations. It would also mingle and unjustly confuse the property of one society and its membership with that of another society and its membership.

Your remonstrants respectfully submit that the bill reported on 16th March last from the Judiciary Committee, by Mr. KNOTT, provides for what is demanded by right and justice and the honor of the nation. And they ask that it may be passed.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, at the request of many of my constituents, who are deeply interested, and in accordance with my own sense of right and duty, I present to the House as briefly and distinctly as practicable my views on the important subject of the distribution of the funds awarded by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva. In my opinion the length of the discussion regarding it is to be attributed rather to the magnitude of the amount involved than to any intrinsic difficulty in understanding or determining the principles of law and justice so far as they are applicable to this case.

During the war various insurance companies and private claimants sent memorials to the Department of State, setting forth their demands against Great Britain for losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the cruisers of the insurgents, and requested the interposition of the Government of the United States in their behalf. The underwriters, confidently relying on the ultimate protection of their rights by their country, from time to time, as they paid for vessels and cargoes destroyed by the cruisers, communicated to the State Department full, formal proofs of the facts and of the value of the losses. The Department through the Hon. William H. Seward, then Secretary of State, punctiliously (as was his duty) replied to each of the statements thus made, and transmitted the claim "to the United States minister at London, with a view to such reparation as may be justly due."

Afterward, when the war was over, the Government, through the Department of State, issued an official notice, dated September 22, 1865, calling upon "citizens of the United States having claims against foreign governments, not founded on contracts," to forward them to that Department, urgently asked compliance "without delay," and accompanied the notice with rules for the guidance of applicants, directing the insertion in each claim of a request "for the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented." In accordance with the trust thus confided to our Government by the sufferers, the claims were duly presented to the government of Great Britain and subsequently to the tribunal at Geneva.

In pursuance of the same line of manifest duty, requiring every government to afford due protection to its citizens or subjects, Mr. Fish, as Secretary of State, replied to letters inclosing claims of the class already described, promised that his Department would "present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, all claims growing out of the acts of the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generally known as the Alabama claims," and requested that they might be presented in due time.

The claims were duly presented by our Government to the tribunal at Geneva, in accordance with the treaty of Washington. Throughout all the proceedings they were uniformly treated as the claims of private parties, who on their part placed implicit, unquestioning trust and confidence in the due protection and good faith and integrity of the Government. All doubt or question as to their rights or the disposal of the funds is an after-thought, having no origin in the tribunal and contrary to its intentions and conclusions.

In formally submitting its case to the tribunal, the Government of the United States placed first in the general statement of the claims for which it asked reparation "the direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers." The other injuries for which compensation was sought were—

The national expenditure in the pursuit of those cruisers;

The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;

The enhanced payments of insurance;

The prolongation of the war, and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

Great Britain objected to the presentation of the three latter classes of claims, and refused to proceed with the arbitration unless they were withdrawn. The United States refused to withdraw them. A failure of the arbitration was imminent. At this crisis, the president of the tribunal, on behalf of all the arbitrators, announced that they, after the most careful perusal of all that had been said on the part of the Government of the United States in respect to these classes of claims, had "arrived individually and collectively at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award." The United States authorized their agent to state that they accepted this declaration as determinative of the judgment of the arbitrators on the important question of public law involved, and that these classes of claims might be excluded from consideration in any award that might be made.

Subsequently, by protocol 27, dated August 29, 1872, a majority of the tribunal decided to reject the claims for expenditures incurred in pursuit of the cruisers, on the ground that they were comprised in the cost of the war.

Thenceforth there remained only for consideration by the tribunal the claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers. The basis of the award was further and distinctly narrowed down by the tribunal to the private losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the acts of the Alabama, the Florida, and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after she left the port of Melbourne. In accordance with this decision the arbitrators requested the Government of the United States to furnish them with definite information as to the amount of such losses, and, complying with the request, on the 19th of August, 1872, a schedule was presented on behalf of our Government enumerating specifically the vessels destroyed by the cruisers for whose acts Great Britain was held to be liable, showing the value of each vessel so destroyed and of her cargo, as proved by the claims filed for it, including those of the insurance companies.

The judgment of the tribunal was that there had been a violation of the obligations of neutrality on the part of Great Britain; that she was consequently "responsible for the American ships which were destroyed by the vessels in question." In view of this decision, the only remaining duty of the tribunal was either to ascertain and award to the United States such a sum in gross as was deemed sufficient to cover those private losses, as it was empowered to do by the seventh article of the treaty, or to remit the duty of auditing each claim for the losses to a board of assessors, as provided in article 10. The former was deemed the most satisfactory course. Its adoption was requested on the part of this country, and the gross sum of $15,500,000 was accordingly awarded to the United States. The majority was four to one. The award, of course, included alike such of the destroyed vessels as were insured and those which were uninsured. In determining what sum in gross should be awarded, the tribunal considered the claims on the proofs submitted to it, those of the insurance companies being the most conspicuous among the claims thus submitted.

The United States have now received the money, have admitted that it is not their own, and established a special court for its distribution; but have closed its doors against every insurance company which cannot show that its whole business during the four years of the war, so far as the war risks were concerned, was unprofitable.

At this point it becomes necessary to consider the principles on which marine insurance is conducted among commercial nations. It has always been regarded as a proposition thoroughly established, that whatever is recovered of the ship or cargo insured is the property of the insurer who has paid the original owner the value of it. It would be superfluous to spend time in proving this undeniable proposition. Daniel Webster said of it:

> There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized and commercial world than that an underwriter who has paid a loss on ship or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment. And if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter.

It was upon this principle that the claims of our people to reparation for the British violations of the laws of neutrals were advanced by our Government. On the part of Great Britain the justice of our case thus urged was distinctly admitted in the words—

> The American insurance companies who have paid the owners as for a total loss are in our opinion entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter, according to the well known principle that an underwriter who has paid as for a total loss acquires the rights of the assured in respect of the subject-matter of insurance.

The principle of marine insurance requiring that the parties who have paid the owners in full for their losses shall have whatever may be afterward recovered is seen, even on slight reflection, to be founded on morality and justice. It resembles that involved where payment of a note is guaranteed for a pecuniary consideration, and, the maker refusing to pay, the note is paid by the guarantor, but afterward collected from the maker. Obviously the guarantor who has paid the owner in full is entitled to all that is recovered.

Or, to take an illustration yet more closely analogous to the case in point, a vessel fully insured does not arrive at the port when she is expected. The parties who have agreed to pay for her in case of loss honorably fulfill their engagement, and fully indemnify the owners. Ultimately the vessel, having been detained by unforeseen causes, comes to port. To whom does she belong? Manifestly not to the original owners. They have been paid, and in law and justice have transferred their claim to those who paid them. The risk has been run, but there has been no loss. Yet further from all right would it be for any third party, even the United States, to step in and, by the power of force, give the vessel to other parties.

We are not approaching the subject of the disposal of the amount paid to us as if the money were our own, to be given as we choose. Two-thirds of it remain undistributed. It was awarded for specific purposes and for no others, and the money was paid to the Government of our country for parties whose claims were admitted to be just and who had confided them to the Government as its best and truest trustee.

The bill reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee makes provision for three classes of claims. It provides:

> That the first class shall be for claims directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked on the high seas, although destroyed within four miles of the shore, except as provided for in section 11 of said chapter 459. The second class shall be for claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser. The third class shall be for claims for sums actually paid for insured property destroyed on the high seas by such confederate cruisers, except sums for which judgments have been entered under section 12 of said chapter.
> That judgments entered in the first class shall be paid before judgments of the second class are paid; and judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid. If the sum of money so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the judgments of the first class, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the whole amount of such unappropriated sum. If such sum shall be sufficient to pay the judgments of the first class, and not sufficient to pay the judgments of the second class, the latter judgments shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the residue of such unappropriated sum. If such sum shall be sufficient to pay the judgments of the first and second classes, and not sufficient to pay the judgments of the third class, they shall be paid according to the proportions which they severally bear to the residue of such unappropriated sum after the payment of the judgments of the first and second classes.

The Geneva tribunal adjusted only the liability of Great Britain for the admitted depredations committed by the Florida, Alabama, and Shenandoah after leaving Melbourne, and their tenders, the Tuscaloosa, Clarence, Tacony, and the Archer, and excluded from consideration, in the award of damages, the Georgia, Sumter, Nashville, and other exculpated cruisers. In opposition to this decision, the bill allows to be presented claims resulting from damage done on the high seas by all "confederate cruisers during the late rebellion," without the limitation imposed by the arbitrators and in direct conflict with the intent and decision of the chosen tribunal.

In equally bad faith is the provision allowing claims for the payment of the premiums on war risks, which were distinctly ruled out by the tribunal. This ruling was recognized and accepted by the agent and counsel who represented our Government at Geneva; and, to make yet more glaring the enormity of the proposed bill, the claims of the insurance companies, which seem to come clearly within the award, are placed in the last class, without possibility of payment after the wrongful demands, excluded by the tribunal but placed by the bill in the first and second classes, have been satisfied.

The majority of the Committee say, with an evident desire to palliate the transparent injustice they suggest inflicting on the insurance companies, that the first class of claims for which provision is made in this bill will not, they think, exceed $1,500,000, and the second class $5,000,000, leaving $4,000,000 for the insurers. A significant commentary on these estimates is that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee in the last House, who urged the same interests as have priority in the report made by the majority of the present committee, in answer to a question by another honorable member, replied that the bill then under consideration, and which is now a law, would require only $3,000,000 to satisfy the claims for which it provided. As matter of fact it has taken between eight and nine millions. The probability is that the first two claims for which provision is made in the bill reported by the committee would swell in larger proportions.

It would be difficult to find in the whole history of pernicious legislation a precedent more dangerous to public and private integrity than the perversion of the funds our country has obtained from Great Britain for specific purposes, which were admitted to be just, to other purposes for which it was not and never would have been awarded. There is no doubt how the courts would decide, and I regret that a knowledge that no court in equity would reject the doctrine of subrogation as applied to the insurance companies, should be assigned as a reason why Congress ought to take the matter into its own hands and make its own will the law. It is bad enough that Congress should disregard settled principles and rules as to the rights of property, but that such a doctrine as this is avowed in open debate in this House is deeply to be deplored. Having called to our aid in settling the claims of our citizens against the British government men of the most profound legal knowledge and the highest character among other leading nations of the world, the attention of civilized mankind is directed toward us. The reputation as well as the honor and honesty of our country is at stake, and if we fail in our duty, we shall be deemed now and through future history to have added publicly and as a nation a portentous illustration to the already long catalogue of the too prevalent characteristics of the times.

While the facts I have presented are beyond doubt or cavil, the considerations which should regulate our decisions as to the Alabama claims are so unquestionable as to be out of the region of debate. I repeat that the Government of our country obtained the money through the award of a great international court appointed by the leading civilized nations, with the hope not only of solving the difficulties which then existed, but of establishing a precedent which would tend to promote human progress by substituting just and honorable arbitrament for settlements through brute force and the horrors of war. We are bound to respect the rulings of the court; and those whose good opinion is best worth deserving will judge us by the disposal we make of the funds committed to our charge.

Our Government obtained the award as damages for the destruction of private property, and on proofs supplied by its owners. As the Government itself never owned the property, it cannot possibly be the rightful owner of the damages or have any right to confiscate them.

In presenting the claims before the court as grounds for damages, the Government insisted upon their validity. If it has now discovered that they were invalid and that it was an error to present them, only one alternative remains. The plain and common rules of honesty and fair dealing are as obligatory in arbitraments between nations as between individuals; and if, after recovery of damages, the plaintiff nation ascertains or becomes convinced that the recovery was founded on wrong or error, it is bound in honor and good faith to return the sum improperly collected. While Great Britain would doubtless be unwilling to receive again any part of the sum she has paid to the Government of the United States under the award, she cannot be expected to regard without interest an alienation of the money and its application to objects for which, by so high a tribunal, it has been decided that she is not responsible.

The duty of the Government, apart from this alternative, is plain and simple. Having received the money as the value of private property, it is bailee or trustee for the owners. Repudiation of the trust or bailment by any individual under the same circumstances would be severely punished in a court of justice. The nation cannot be sued, but it is therefore so much the more firmly bound by higher considerations of right and policy to render no less justice than the private trustee would be constrained to do. All fair consideration of this subject leads to the same conclusions. The only just claim on the part of the Government is the one per cent. interest, the difference between what it has paid and received. This is fairly its right, and should be covered into the Treasury.

The Government ought freely and promptly to submit all claims upon which the award was based to proper audit before the distributing tribunal, where they can be heard upon their merits and decided in accordance with the principles of legal right. No other course will afford substantial or valid protection to the national Treasury, and any indirect or arbitrary procedure cannot fail to disgrace our country in the estimation of the whole civilized world.

When Mr. WARD had proceeded a short time in the delivery of the foregoing remarks,

Mr. McCRARY said: I raise the question of order whether it is in order to discuss the Geneva award upon the Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the custom in Committee of the Whole to allow members, during the general debate, to take such scope in the discussion as they might see proper.

Mr. McCRARY. That, I believe, has been by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has heard no objection to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] proceeding.

Mr. McCRARY. I make the point of order that the Geneva award bill should not be discussed upon the Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is too late at this time to raise that point. The gentleman has the floor and has proceeded some time in his remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this point cannot very well come too late, because it could not be raised until we had heard the tenor of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. McCRARY. I delayed making the point only long enough to understand the subject upon which the gentleman was speaking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls attention to a ruling on the eighty-sixth page of the Digest:

> It is too late to make the question of order that a member has already spoken if no one claims the floor until he has made some progress in his speech.

By analogy it is too late to make the point of order that a gentleman is not speaking to the question, when he has already delivered by consent a portion of his remarks.

Mr. McCRARY. It was impossible for us to know beforehand whether the gentleman was going to discuss the bill or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman stated at the commencement of his remarks the subject he proposed to discuss.

Mr. McCRARY. I did not hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. A practice of this kind has been allowed on several important occasions during the present session, notably in the case of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] who discussed the financial question in Committee of the Whole when the subject under consideration was the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. The custom has been so general that, as the point of order was not raised at the time, the Chair thinks it is in order for the gentleman to proceed.

[Mr. WARD resumed and concluded his remarks as already given.]

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I have an amendment to offer to this paragraph, and if it be agreeable to the gentleman I ask him to agree to a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL. My only object in having the bill read by paragraphs for amendment was to save an hour and a half of general debate. That object having been accomplished and the first paragraph of the bill having been read for amendment, I now move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. I object.

LOUISIANA COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced that he had appointed Mr. WOODBURN, of Nevada, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. HOSKINS on the Louisiana investigating committee.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of employés of the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

And then, on motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, memorials, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of George W. Cochran & Co. and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, for an appropriation for the improvement of the Washington channel of the Potomac River, from the Long Bridge to the Arsenal Point, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HALE: The petition of Samuel H. Travers and others, owners of the brigantine Solferino of Baltimore, for demurrage, to the same committee.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of Daniel Williamson, for compensation as a guide for the United States Army, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of James Mendenhall, Job H. Jackson, and other citizens of Chester County, Pennsylvania, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of D. C. Babcock, Richard Bedford, and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. PAYNE: The petition of Harriet Beard, for indemnity for property taken by the United States troops in the war of 1812 from a farm near the village of Black Rock, New York, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SEELYE: Petitions for the acknowledgment of God and Christianity in the Constitution of the United States, signed by 1,707 persons residing in the States of Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of S. H. McCurd and 33 other soldiers of Manchester, Michigan, for the extension of the provisions of the bounty-land act to soldiers and sailors of the late war, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of M. E. Chittenden & Co., and others, of Adrian, Michigan, against any change in the law regulating the manner of packing tobacco, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The following petition was presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, without having indorsed thereon the name of any member of the House, and referred as stated:

The petition of tobacco-dealers of Troy, New York, against any change in the law regulating the manner of packing tobacco, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 23d instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 258) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company;

An act (S. No. 679) relating to interments in the Congressional Cemetery; and

An act (S. No. 764) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to allow Mrs. Minnie Sherman Fitch to receive, free from duties, a wedding present from the Khedive of Egypt.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to announce the order of the Senate; but if there be no objection the legislative session will be continued for morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WALLACE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the vacancies existing upon the Committee on Manufactures and the Committee on the District of Columbia, caused by the withdrawal of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. ENGLISH,] and I ask that some action be taken upon the subject.

By unanimous consent the Chair was authorized to fill the vacancies, and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. BARNUM upon the committees named.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Amelia Ferguson, widow of Professor James Ferguson, deceased, praying to be granted a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Robert L. May, praying to be restored to the retired list of the Navy on furlough pay, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of R. L. Law, commander United States Navy, praying to be restored to the original position in the Navy occupied by him prior to July, 1866, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In the matter of the petition of Captain Francis A. Roe, United States Navy, praying re-imbursement for property taken and appropriated by the rebel government in Virginia in 1861, the Committee on Naval Affairs report adversely, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition. I will say in reference to this case that the committee are well convinced that the officer who petitions is meritorious as regards his character and services and that he was subjected to great hardship, but they think that to comply with the request would be establishing a rule that would be inconvenient and unjust to the Treasury. Therefore we report adversely.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 859) for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WEST asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 863) to change the name of the steamship City of Brashear to Lone Star; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 864) authorizing the Nebraska City Bridge Company to construct a railway bridge across the Missouri River at Nebraska City, in Otoe County, Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 865) to confirm a lease of certain coal lands within the reservation belonging to the Iowa tribe of Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

THEODORE F. MILLER.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a little bill, and after I make a statement of the facts in connection with it I think there cannot be any objection whatever to its passage. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and to pay to Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, the bounty to which he would have been entitled under the law if he had been regularly mustered out and discharged with his regiment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the facts in the case?

Mr. WRIGHT. With the indulgence of the Senate I will state the facts in connection with this case. The father of this petitioner was a resident of my county. He entered the Union service, as did also three of his sons, his eldest son James, and his twin sons Henry Clay and Theodore Frelinghuysen Miller. The father was called home by reason of sickness, or rather a disease of his eyes. Some six months after his return home he was suddenly killed by the running away of his horses, leaving a farm of some six or seven hundred acres in my county without any person to take charge of it. I was applied to by the widow to request, if possible, that some one of the three boys should be released from service and allowed to return home to take charge of the place. The application was made, and Theodore, the party named in the bill, was sent home, without any knowledge upon his part, without any application or request from him, and before his regiment was mustered out. Under the law as it stands he cannot be allowed strictly this bounty. The circumstances are thus peculiar, and this bill proposes to pay him the $100 bounty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD O'M. CONDON.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to ask the Senate to take up a joint resolution which was reported yesterday, and which I then asked the Senate to consider, but some Senator requested that it might lie over to be looked at. I think it will take but a moment. It is a joint resolution suggesting the intercession of our Government to redress any injustice that may have been done to an American citizen imprisoned abroad; and I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of Edward O'M. Condon was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States, is now, and has been for some time, closely confined in prison under the sentence of a British court; and that an earnest and profound desire, evidenced by resolutions of State Legislatures and petitions numerously signed and addressed to Congress, is entertained by a large and respectable portion of the people of the United States that he should be speedily released. Therefore the resolution requests the President to take such steps as, in his judgment, may tend to obtain the early release of Condon from imprisonment.

The Committee on Foreign Relations reported the joint resolution with an amendment to strike out the word "early" in line 5, and insert the words "pardon or;" so as to read:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to take such steps as, in his judgment, may tend to obtain the pardon or release of the said Edward O'M. Condon from imprisonment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the joint resolution read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

RANK OF PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. SHERMAN. The other day I objected to the consideration of a bill that was about being put on its passage, which was reported by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE,] in regard to the rank of the Paymaster-General. I wish to withdraw my objection, so as to allow the bill to pass at this time, if there is no objection to it from any other source.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the rank of the Paymaster-General of the Army shall be brigadier-general; but no pay or allowances shall be made to him other than from the date of his appointment under the act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the bill reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is right. It has been amended since it was up on a former occasion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 155) to amend sections 533, 556, and 572 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments, some weeks ago.

The Chief Clerk read the bill and the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DAVIS. I hear the State which I in part represent named. I should like to have that portion of the bill read again.

Mr. CLAYTON. I will state that, so far as West Virginia is concerned, the bill does not affect the present provisions of the law. In enumerating the sections the bill of course refers to West Virginia; but it does not change the jurisdiction in any respect so far as that State is concerned.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether the bill as reported from his committee in any way affects the State of which I am in part a representative?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am unable to inform my friend. The bill was reported by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] from the Judiciary Committee; and the details of it are entirely out of my mind. Undoubtedly the Senator from Wisconsin can inform the Senator from West Virginia. The Senator from Wisconsin is now at the desk examining the bill. He will take his place presently.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to look at it myself.

Mr. DAVIS. By that time we shall have an opportunity of looking at it. I think it had better go over, as it is due to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has the floor, that we should proceed with the regular order of business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to be understood that I only object to the consideration of the bill this morning. I will not object to taking it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

DES MOINES LAND GRANTS.

Several Senators called for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Legislative and executive business will now be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. OGLESBY. While the doors are being closed, I ask leave to present a petition forwarded to me, very largely signed by citizens and inhabitants of the State of Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the petition.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will state that the petition relates to a subject with which I am not at all familiar; and while I do not approve of all the language used in it, as I read it, yet it is probably of such a character as to give the memorialists the right to be heard; and this has been suggested to me by those who have more experience here than myself. I present the memorial and ask to have it referred to the proper committee. I do not know to which committee it ought to go, but I presume the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send the memorial to the desk.

Mr. OGLESBY. There are two memorials, one largely signed, and the other with two names appended. Why these memorials were sent to me, I cannot tell.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. When the Senator from Illinois obtained the floor, I was rising to make a motion to go into executive session, and with the favor of the Senate I beg to be allowed to make that motion now. I have an amendment to a treaty to present which will not occupy ten minutes. It is an important matter and can be disposed of at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending proceedings in the trial, the Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask to what committee the memorials presented by the Senator from Illinois were referred?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. ALLISON. They ought to be referred either to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Public Lands. They relate to a matter of very great importance to my State. A great number of people there are interested in the subject. If there is any remedy attainable by Congress, they ought to have it, and I think the petitions should go either to the Judiciary Committee or to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. OGLESBY. Let them be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois who presented the petitions asks their reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It strikes me that the Committee on Public Lands is the appropriate committee.

Mr. OGLESBY. The matter does not relate to public lands at all. The lands referred to are all private.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the case ought to go to the Committee on Private Land Claims. There is not any important question of law in it, is there?

Mr. OGLESBY. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the memorials pray that Congress may pass a law to direct the Supreme Court of the United States to cause the district courts of the United States in the State of Iowa to grant some injunction or other perpetual order against the Des Moines River Company from running canals, &c., on public lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend has stated the case strong enough. I give it up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I happen to know something about this matter. It is a controversy between private parties, citizens, and claimants under a grant by Congress to a company in the State of Iowa for making the Des Moines improvement. The petitions ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands. This is one of the hardest cases of gross injustice done to people who have gone upon lands unsettled that I ever heard of. My own impression is that the corporation stole the land. We are in secret session, so I am at liberty to use a very strong word on the subject. I say that the corporation really stole the land.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that this is an important question. It involves the construction of a great many statutes and the decisions of the Supreme Court in a great many cases. There has certainly been a very great hardship inflicted upon a large number of settlers in Iowa who went upon these lands in good faith. If there is any remedy, I think that the Judiciary Committee can find it. Therefore I quite agree that the petitions ought to go to that committee.

Mr. SARGENT. As the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, I trust the petitions will go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say a word in sober earnest about this business. The Judiciary Committee does not wish to shirk any duty; but it cannot perform more duties than all the time it can possibly devote to its duties will allow. I can state, I think, in a way that will not be denied, that we are overloaded with work now, so that our chance of acting upon this matter at this session carefully and intelligently, unless we overslaugh something else that is already before us, is quite small.

Secondly, this matter is of importance, as the Senator from Ohio has said. I have heard of it before; but, according to my general impression—I do not remember anything about the state of the law in particular—these settlers have come to grief; and of course it is a very great hardship, for although they probably went, as the Supreme Court has decided, in violation of law and had to take their chances like everybody else who runs the risk of a lawsuit, yet of course they were a people who were not skillful in law and who acted in perfect good faith undoubtedly. But the real party at fault, aside from the navigation company, I am afraid, is, with all respect, the Legislature of the State of Iowa. That was overcome by the navigation company and induced to make a grant of this land, as has often happened, and has happened, I will say, in the State of Vermont, so that I shall not be invidious, where a greedy corporation has squeezed settlers by getting the Legislature into its power.

I am afraid that has been the case, and generally I think the Committee on Public Lands consider such a matter, although it may involve questions of law, because I am bound to say in justice (and my friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] and other Senators present know it is the case) that unless the Judiciary Committee "boost" this out of its order altogether, the chance of being able to act upon it at this session is quite small.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire what manner of session we are in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is in open session.

Mr. PADDOCK. Would it not be well, then, to open the doors?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can do open business with the doors shut.

Mr. PADDOCK. It seems to me that there is great impropriety in carrying on a discussion here on an important matter with the doors closed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reporter has been taking notes. The question is on the motion to refer the petitions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. Fifteen minutes were spent in executive session.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The Senate, pursuant to order, proceeded to deliberate on the impeachment case.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, (at five o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 24, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., the Speaker in the chair. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RAYMOND'S MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. BLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, reported the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed of the reports of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics for 1875, with the accompanying engravings, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the Senate, and 500 for the Secretary of the Treasury and the commissioners.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. BALLOU. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the following concurrent resolution from the Senate, and move that it be concurred in:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,500 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1875 be printed; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,500 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages shall not exceed 450, and that there shall be no illustrations except those furnished by the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was concurred in.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, some days ago I reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws a bill (H. R. No. 3156) to correct errors and to supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States, which was made the special order for the last day of this month. Since then certain amendments have been agreed to by the committee, and I ask that the bill and amendments be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

WISCONSIN LAND GRANTS.

Mr. CATE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3569) for the relief of persons who have settled upon or improved for agricultural purposes lands granted to the State of Wisconsin by acts approved June 3, 1856, and May 5, 1864, for railroad purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN. I ask by unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claim sreported allowed by the commissioners of claims under act of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes, be now taken up for consideration. It will take but a few minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that bill should be disposed of under suspension of the rules on Monday. There is a disagreement in the committee about one or two claims, and I hope the gentleman will let it go over until next Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object, and demand the regular order of business.

PUBLIC LANDS IN ALABAMA, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and fourteen minutes, and the regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on Public Lands.

The pending business is the bill reported by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOREY] from the Committee on the Public Lands, the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, confining the disposal of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida to the provisions of the homestead law be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That the repeal of said section shall not have the effect to impair the right, complete or inchoate, of any homestead settler, and no land occupied by such settler at the time this act shall take effect shall be subject to entry, pre-emption, or sale: And provided, That the public lands affected by this act shall be offered at public sale, as soon as practicable, from time to time, and according to the provisions of existing law, and shall not be subject to private entry until they are so offered.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands were read, as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 11, after the word "act" and before the word "shall," the following: "which are unsuited for agricultural purposes." And at the end of the section add as follows: "and that all public lands in said States fitted for the purposes of agriculture shall be subject to disposal under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States, and not otherwise: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to affect the disposal of any mineral lands as now provided by law."

Mr. MOREY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to ask at the proper time the previous question on the bill without any amendments whatever. I desire that the morning hour to-day shall be occupied by ten-minute speeches for and against the bill, and we expect at the close of the morning hour to call the previous question and dispose of the bill. I yield first to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was last before the House, I listened attentively to the very able and interesting remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and I must confess that I was somewhat disappointed. Instead of a discussion of the merits or demerits of the bill he detained and interested us for over one hour in a glowing and eloquent eulogy of our homestead law, never once touching the question before the House. While his effort was indeed able, yet it seemed to me to be out of place and violative of that rule of debate which forbids a departure from the subject under consideration, if not of that other rule, that rule which requires the fitness of things to be considered, the time, the place, the subject.

The gentleman's effort would to my mind have been much more appropriate in a political canvass upon the stump in Indiana or elsewhere before the populace than here in a deliberative body of the Representatives of the American people when the question discussed was not before the House. But it may have been that my friend did not intend his remarks for this House, but rather, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. YEATES] said the other day, "for the good of the people." I suppose he intended to show his constituents that he was not only careful of their interests, but that he was equally watchful of the welfare of the citizens of Alabama; that his long experience in the halls of legislation at the national capital better qualified him to look after and guard the interest of the people of Alabama than their immediate Representatives upon this floor who had had so little experience in such legislation.

Although the bill now before the House does not affect injuriously any citizen of Indiana in the least degree and is purely local, applying to five southern States alone, all of whose representatives, so far as I am informed, favor its passage, and although it does not take one cent from the public Treasury of the United States, but may add millions to it, and although the people of these States affected by the bill demand its passage, still the gentleman stands up here in opposition to it and is doing all in his power to defeat a measure upon the success of which depend in great degree the future prosperity and greatness of Alabama. Sir, I believe the Representatives from Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Florida, and Alabama better understand the wants and interest of the people of their respective States than my friend, however great may be his ability and however large may have been his experience in national legislation.

It is not my purpose to follow the line of argument of the gentleman from Indiana; for, as I have heretofore said, it was foreign to the subject under consideration. But I desire to correct an error fallen into by some of the gentlemen of this House. It has been asserted here, and I believe, too, by my friend from Indiana, that the policy of securing homesteads to the landless had its origin within the last ten or fifteen years, thus giving the republican party all the credit for that beneficent policy. This is an error. To Mr. Thomas H. Benton and General Andrew Jackson belong the honor and glory of that munificent policy of gratuitons grants of the public domain to actual settlers. This policy was advocated by these statesmen long before the present republican party had any existence in this country. Mr. Benton for years waged an unrelenting war upon the policy of public sales of lands and, as far back as 1826, advocated, in a strong speech full of wisdom and cogent reasons, gratuitous grants to actual settlers, showing most conclusively that the labor of the settler was the true way to extract national wealth and strength from the soil:

Tenantry is unfavorable to freedom. It lays the foundation for separate orders in society, annihilates the love of country, and weakens the spirit of independence. The farming tenant has, in fact, no country, no hearth, no domestic altar, no household god. The freeholder, on the contrary, is the natural supporter of a free government, and it should be the policy of republics to multiply their freeholders, as it is the policy of monarchies to multiply tenants. We are a Republic, and we wish to continue so; then multiply the class of freeholders; pass the public lands cheaply and easily into the hands of the people; sell for a reasonable price to those who are able to pay, and give without price to those who are not. I say give without price to those who are not able to pay; and that which is so given I consider as sold for the best of prices, for a price above gold and silver, a price which cannot be carried away by delinquent officers, nor lost in failing banks, nor stolen by thieves, nor squandered by an improvident and extravagant administration. It brings a price above rubies, a race of virtuous and independent laborers, the true supporters of their country, and the stock from which its best defenders must be drawn.

And again he says:

These Atlantic States were donations from the British Crown; and the great proprietors distributed out their possessions with a free and generous hand. A few shillings for a hundred acres, a nominal quitrent, and gifts of a hundred, five hundred, and a thousand acres to actual settlers, such were the terms on which they dealt out the soil which is now covered by a nation of freemen. Provinces, which now form sovereign States, were sold from hand to hand for a less sum than the Federal Government now demands for an area of two miles square. I could name instances. I could name the State of Maine, a name for more reasons than one familiar and agreeable to Missouri, and whose pristine territory was sold by Sir Ferdinando Gorges to the proprietors of the Massachusetts Bay for twelve hundred pounds provincial money. And well it was for Maine that she was so sold; well it was for her that the modern policy of waiting for the rise and sticking at a minimum of $1.25 was not then in vogue, or else Maine would have been a desert now. Instead of a numerous, intelligent, and virtuous population, we should have had trees and wild beasts. I say well it was for Maine that she was sold for the Federal price of four sections of Alabama pine, Louisiana swamp, or Missouri prairie. Well it was for every State in this Union that their soil was sold for a song, or given as a gift to whomsoever would take it. Happy for them and for the liberty of the human race that the kings of England and the "lords proprietors" did not conceive the luminous idea of waiting for the rise and sticking to a minimum of $1.25 per acre. Happy for Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio that they were settled under States, and not under the Federal Government. To this happy exemption they owe their present greatness and prosperity. When they were settled the State laws prevailed in the acquisition of lands; and donations, pre emptions, and settlement rights, and sales at two cents the acre were the order of the day. I include Ohio and I do it with a knowledge of what I say: for ten millions of her soil—that which now constitutes her chief wealth and strength—were settled upon the liberal principles which I mention. The Federal system only fell upon fifteen millions of her soil; and of that quantity the one-half now lies waste and useless, paying no tax to the State, yielding nothing to agriculture, desert spots in the midst of a smiling garden, "waiting for the rise," and exhibiting, in high and bold relief, the miserable folly of prescribing an arbitrary minimum upon that article which is the gift of God to man, and which no parental government has ever attempted to convert into a source of revenue and an article of merchandise.

General Jackson, in his veto message of Mr. Clay's bill to distribute the revenue arising from the sale of the public lands among the States, supported Mr. Benton's views:

I deceive myself greatly if the new States would find their interests promoted by such a system as this bill proposes. Their true policy consists in the rapid settling and improvement of the waste lands within their limits. As a means of hastening those events, they have long been looking to a reduction in the price of public lands upon the final payment of the national debt. The effect of the proposed system would be to prevent that reduction. It is true the bill reserves to Congress the power to reduce the price; but the effect of its details, as now arranged, would probably be forever to prevent its exercise.

With the just men who inhabit the new States it is a sufficient reason to reject this system that it is in violation of the fundamental laws of the Republic and its Constitution. But if it were a mere question of interest or expediency they would still reject it. They would not sell their bright prospect of increasing wealth and growing power at such a price. They would not place a sum of money to be paid into their treasuries in competition with the settlement of their waste lands and the increase of their population. They would not consider a small or large annual sum to be paid to their governments and immediately expended as an equivalent for that enduring wealth which is composed of flocks and herds and cultivated farms. No temptation will allure them from that object of abiding interest, the settlement of their waste lands and the increase of a hardy race of free citizens, their glory in peace and their defense in war.

On the whole, I adhere to the opinion expressed by me in my annual message of 1832, that it is our true policy that the public lands shall cease as soon as practicable to be a source of revenue, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey and sale. I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of these lands shall be reduced and graduated, and that, after they have been offered for a certain number of years, the refuse remaining unsold shall be abandoned to the States and the machinery of our land system entirely withdrawn. It cannot be supposed the compacts intended that the United States should retain forever a title to lands within the States which are of no value, and no doubt is entertained that the general interest would be best promoted by surrendering such lands to the States.

In 1832, William R. King, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the United States Senate, made a report expressing the views of Mr. Benton, General Jackson, and the democratic party upon the subject of the disposal of the public domain:

The committee ventures to suggest that the view which the Committee on Manufactures has taken of the Federal domain is fundamentally erroneous; that it has misconceived the true principles of national policy with respect to wild lands; and from this fundamental mistake and radical misconception have resulted the great errors which pervade the whole structure of their report and bill.

The Committee on Manufactures seem to contemplate the Federal domain merely as an object of revenue, and to look for that revenue solely from the receivers of the land offices, when the science of political economy has ascertained such a fund to be chiefly, if not exclusively, valuable under the aspect of population and cultivation, and the eventual extraction of revenue from the people in its customary modes of taxes and imposts.

The celebrated Edmund Burke is supposed to have expressed the sum-total of political wisdom on this subject in his well-known propositions to convert the forest lands of the British Crown into private property; and this committee, to spare themselves further argument and to extinguish at once a political fallacy which ought not to have been broached in the nineteenth century, will make a brief quotation from the speech of that eminent man:

"The revenue to be derived from the sale of the forest lands will not be so considerable as many have imagined, and I conceive it would be unwise to screw it up to the utmost or even to suffer bidders to enhance according to their eagerness the purchase of objects wherein the expense of that purchase may weaken the capital to be employed in their cultivation. * * * The principal revenue which I propose to draw from these uncultivated wastes is to spring from the improvement and cultivation of the kingdom, events infinitely more advantageous to the revenues of the Crown than the rents of the best landed estates which it can hold. * * * It is thus that I would dispose of the unprofitable landed estates of the Crown, throw them into the mass of private property, by which they will come through the course of circulation and through the political secretions of the state into well-regulated revenue. * * * Thus would fall an expensive agency, with all the influence which attends it."

This committee takes leave to say that the sentiments here expressed by Mr. Burke are the inspirations of political wisdom; that their truth and justice have been tested in all ages and all countries, and particularly in our own age and in our own country.

The graduation and pre-emption laws, all intended to secure homes to the homeless and lands to the landless and in many particulars superior and better adapted for the purpose intended than the present homestead law, were democratic measures and passed by democratic votes. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I most cordially and heartily indorse all that Mr. Benton, General Jackson, and Mr. King said in the quotations I have given, and I think they point out the true policy of the Government in the disposal of the public domain. I would to-day vote to donate to every head of a family who does not own land a homestead without requiring a five years' residence and cultivation. I would make a gratuitous grant of one hundred and sixty acres upon an affidavit that the entry is made for actual settlement or cultivation, and at the expiration of twelve months a patent should issue without further proof, unless in the mean time some steps had been taken to set aside the entry for fraud.

The present homestead law requires too much of the settler, and should be amended in many particulars. It professes to give a home to the homeless, yet it requires five years' service, and then at the expiration of five years proof by at least two witnesses of a strict compliance with its terms, thus costing the poor man often from twenty-five to one hundred dollars. This boasted beneficent so called poor man's law, which has been so highly extolled by the gentleman from Indiana as the perfection of human wisdom and an honor to its projectors, demands, as I have said, of the settler as a condition precedent to the completion of his title, besides his personal affidavit of entry, proof by the testimony of two witnesses of his previous compliance with the requirements of the law as to continued occupancy for five years. And this requisition as to testimony of witnesses is unaccompanied by any compulsory process in favor of the settler whereby he may force the attendance of these witnesses. The settler, it is seen, is therefore liable to the extortionate demands of these witnesses as to the amount of pay they may receive for their services. And, indeed, he can have no witnesses at all unless they see proper voluntarily to comply with his request to go and deliver their testimony in his behalf.

This wholly unnecessary and costly requirement will deprive many of the poor who have made entries under said law of their homesteads, and will appropriate their hard-earned improvements to the use of some other more fortunate settler, while it debars them from ever again acquiring a home under its provisions. Amend the homestead law as I have suggested, and you will give general relief to the poor and enable them to acquire an interest in the soil.

But, Mr. Speaker, while Mr. Benton, General Jackson, and Mr. King advocated the policy of gratuitous grants to actual settlers, they never thought of tying up the public lands and holding them alone for actual settlers. The policy of these statesmen and of the democratic party has ever been to donate homesteads to actual settlers and to sell at the minimum prices to such persons as desired to purchase. To the gentleman from Indiana and his friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] belong the distinguished honor of originating the hoarding policy. I refer both of these gentlemen to what the celebrated Edmund Burke said upon this subject near one hundred years ago, which I have heretofore quoted. They will find the principles in political economy there expressed in relation to the public domain "profoundly sagacious in themselves, applicable to all sovereign landed possessions, whether of kings or republics."

The question as to what is the best mode to dispose of the public lands has engaged the attention of the statesmen of our country from an early day. There have been American statesmen of the highest order of intellect who have advocated the policy of holding the public domain as a means of revenue, and among these was Mr. Clay. There have been others of equal ability who have held that the public lands should not be held for any such purpose. The great and incorruptible statesman of the Hermitage, Andrew Jackson, recommended in one of his annual messages to the Congress of the United States, when President, that the public lands, so soon as the revolutionary debt was paid, to which payment they had been pledged, should be turned over to the different States in which they might be located, to be disposed of as each of said States might deem best. This was also, as you have seen from the quotation I have given you, Mr. Benton's view. Mr. Calhoun took a different view from both Mr. Clay and General Jackson. Mr. Clay favored the sale by the United States with a view to revenue and distribution among all the States of the proceeds of the sales. General Jackson favored the transfer to the States in which the lands were located, to be disposed of for the use of the States selling the same. Mr. Calhoun favored the transfer to the States to sell for the use of the United States, giving such States such a percentage of the sales to re-imburse them for the expense of the sales. Both Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun contemplated the Federal domain merely as an object of revenue, while General Jackson took the more comprehensive and statesman-like view of Edmund Burke and Thomas H. Benton, that the public domain was valuable exclusively under the aspect of population and the "eventual extraction of revenue from its people in the customary modes of taxes and imposts." The history of the country has completely vindicated the wisdom of the views of General Jackson, and demonstrated the fallacy of those of Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun.

The public lands have never been a source of revenue to the Government from sales. Alexander Hamilton in 1791, when Secretary of the Treasury, made a report, carefully prepared, in which he clearly showed that the public lands were of little value, not exceeding twenty cents per acre, and subsequent events have fully demonstrated the correctness of that report. General Jackson in 1832, in a document accompanying his veto message of Mr. Clay's bill heretofore mentioned, shows that up to that time, instead of the public lands yielding a revenue, the expenses exceeded the receipts by $1,314,656. I have not had time to examine the difference between the receipts and expenses in the General Land Office since 1832 to the present time, but have carefully reviewed the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and I find that the estimates of expenses of said Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, exceed the receipts of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, $392,458.75. The total estimates of the General Land Office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, are $2,176,460; total receipts from all sources, sales of lands, fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, $1,784,001.27; expenses in excess of receipts, $392,458.73. Thus it will be seen that the public domain is a burden and an expense upon the National Treasury.

It seems to me if the public lands produce no revenue to the Government, but are in fact an expense to the nation, that there can be no good reason assigned why the policy recommended by General Jackson, as had been advocated by Thomas H. Benton, should not be now adopted. There are many strong and cogent reasons why the General Government should transfer the waste and refuse public lands to the respective States in which they may be located. If Edmund Burke expressed the true science of political economy when he recommended the conversion of the forest lands of the British Crown into private property, by which he proposed to extract revenue by the improvement and cultivation of the same, then it seems to me that the best mode to accomplish that end in this country is to turn over all our public lands to the States to manage and control. The local authorities in each State would know more of the character of the public lands in such States and their adaptability for cultivation or lumber or mining than the central Government. Each State would better understand the wants and interests of her citizens in relation thereto than the Federal Government. Each State is anxious to increase her population and wealth, and hence would offer every inducement for immigration. There would be no conflicting interests in her legislation in relation to the disposal of the public lands. Here in the National Congress we have conflicting interests to encounter in its disposal. The old States have ever been jealous of the growth of the new, and are disposed to clog their progress. The iron interest of the North is not favorable to the development of a rival interest in Alabama and other Southern States, and might not encourage the iron men of Europe and elsewhere to invest in that section by a liberal donation of public lands. The coal interest of Indiana is averse to the developing of the five thousand square miles of superior bituminous coal of Alabama, and hence it is perhaps you find some of her Representatives favoring the hoarding of these lands by the Government, so that Indiana may have no rival interest there. We have seen here upon this floor a gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] zealously and energetically opposing the opening up of a lumber interest in Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida. We have heard that gentleman advocate the tying up of the fine forests of the South for governmental purposes, so that no lumber interest could spring up there in competition with that of Michigan. The gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Michigan, though the professed enemies of monopolies, yet are the advocates of a measure, not so intended by them, but which necessarily protects and fosters monopolies.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other reasons why the public lands should be turned over to the States, but I have not the time now to discuss the question further. I shall bring in a bill during this Congress for that purpose, and will then seek an opportunity to discuss this question more fully.

The gentleman from Indiana and his friend from Michigan are apprehensive that the public domain will soon pass into the hands of speculators if the pre-emption and all other laws authorizing the sale of the same otherwise than under the homestead be not repealed. They tell us that our vast public domain is rapidly passing into the hands of private individuals, and at an early day the poor will not be able to acquire an interest in the soil. These gentlemen surely have not investigated this question. Why, Mr. Speaker, there were but 745,000 acres of public lands disposed of during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, by ordinary sales, and there are unsurveyed and unoffered of the public domain 1,154,471,762 acres. At the rate of the ordinary sales at private entry and under the pre-emption law for the said fiscal year it will take fifteen hundred and forty-eight years to dispose of the public domain which is yet to be surveyed. Do these gentlemen propose to tie up our public domain beyond fifteen hundred years in order to give homesteads to the poor of that far-off generation? Far better for the Government and the people if every acre of our public domain was in the hands of private citizens, bearing its proportions of the burdens of the Government, State and Federal. The policy of giving lands to the landless cannot be defended upon any other ground than that it is better for the country that all lands should be in the hands of private persons. It cannot be said that it is the duty of the Government to furnish homes to any, whether rich or poor. Such a doctrine would inevitably lead to that dangerous agrarian idea of division of all lands equally among the people; and if lands, then all other property. If it is the duty of Government to furnish homes to its citizens, then it must continue to do so even when the public domain shall have been exhausted. When gentlemen advocate the homestead policy upon any other basis than that which is expressed by Edmund Burke, General Jackson, and Thomas H. Benton, they are occupying a perilous position.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more dangerous to the perpetuity of our republican form of government and our republican institutions than this fallacious, agrarian principle. I do not charge that either the gentleman from Indiana or his friend from Michigan has expressed any such a doctrine, nor do I believe that either of them hold any such ideas. Government was never organized to feed, to clothe, and to furnish homes and lands to its citizens, but simply to protect them in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and the pursuit of happiness.

I favor the gratuitous grants of homesteads solely upon the idea of increasing the wealth and strength of the nation by population, and the products of the soil from cultivation. All that was said by the gentleman from Indiana in praise of the farmers and the tillers of the soil meets my hearty concurrence. They are an unmixed blessing to the whole country, its glory in peace and its defense in war; and I would not favor any measure which would militate against their interest n the least degree.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other interests of almost equal importance which I would not ignore. All political economists agree that no country should depend alone upon its agriculture. The States in this Union which have the most diversified their industries have been the most prosperous even in agriculture. I will illustrate this proposition by using the States of Pennsylvania and Indiana. They have about the same acreage devoted to agriculture, and Indiana has about six thousand more persons engaged in agricultural pursuits than Pennsylvania. But the farms of Pennsylvania are valued at over $387,000,000 more than those of Indiana, and the value of the annual product of the farms of Pennsylvania is over sixty-one millions in excess of those of Indiana. Why this great difference? It is not in the climate or soil. The answer is, Pennsylvania has diversified her industries far more than Indiana. The former has over one hundred and seventy-five different and distinct industries, while the latter has only about forty-five. The former has over 37,000 manufacturing establishments, employing over 319,000 persons therein, while Indiana has only about 11,000, employing only about 58,000 persons therein.

The products of Pennsylvania manufacturing establishments are over $711,000,000 annually, while those of Indiana are but one hundred and eight millions.

The Pennsylvania farmer finds a market alongside his farm for all his produce, while the Indiana farmer pays out one-half of the value of the products of his farm to drag them to a foreign market.

If we should take the State of Georgia instead of Indiana, and compare it with the State of Pennsylvania, we would have a better illustration of our proposition. The State of Georgia has five millions of acres in cultivation in excess of Pennsylvania. The value of the farms of Pennsylvania is over nine hundred and forty-seven millions in excess of those of Georgia. The State of Georgia has engaged in agricultural pursuits over 76,000 persons more than Pennsylvania, while the value of the annual products of agriculture of Pennsylvania is over one hundred and three millions in excess of those of Georgia. The reason why the Pennsylvania farmer succeeds so much better than the Georgia farmer is found in the fact that Georgia has but 3,836 manufacturing establishments, while Pennsylvania has over 37,000; that Georgia has employed in these establishments only 17,000 persons, while Pennsylvania has over 300,000. Georgia produces from her manufactories annually only about $31,000,000, while Pennsylvania derives over $700,000,000. The Georgia farmer, like the Indiana, seeks a foreign market, while Pennsylvania furnishes a home market for her farmer.

The American Industry, of May 6, says:

> We are strongly of the opinion long since expressed by General Andrew Jackson that those laws which by protecting native industry establish the manufacture by the side of the farm are the only laws which will ever do justice to the American agriculturist. For by creating a home market they will secure a full and fair reward for his products. This they will do at his own door, instead of compelling him to expend more than one-half their value in dragging them over oceans to fill the coffers of the rich manufacturers and feed the pauper laborers of other lands.

The mining and manufacturing interests of this country must be encouraged and fostered by friendly legislation, and it would be extremely unwise to retard them by tying up public lands which in Alabama and elsewhere are necessary for their success. The different and diversified industries of our country are so intimately connected and interwoven in interest that neither can prosper without the other, and he is an unwise or unpatriotic legislator who would elevate and foster the one and depress and retard the other. I would carefully and assiduously nurse and guard every interest of our common country which promotes the general good.

Mr. Speaker, I have wandered away from the bill before the House. I desire to call the attention of the House more particularly to the bill now before us for our action. To understand the bill clearly and intelligently it is necessary to know the manner in which the public lands are disposed of under the Revised Statutes. There are three separate and distinct modes by which the public domain may be disposed of under the general law. The first is under the homestead, of which I have heretofore spoken. The second is under the pre-emption law. This authorizes any person twenty-one years of age, not being a feme-covert, and not owning as much as three hundred and twenty acres of land, and who has settled upon and erected a dwelling upon the public lands, to enter not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres upon making affidavit that such settlement and entry were not made upon speculation but for the sole use of the person making such settlement and entry, and that such person has not had previous thereto the benefit of pre-emption; and at the expiration of twelve months a patent is required to be issued upon the payment of the minimum price therefor. This act contains every safeguard against speculations which is found in the boasted homestead law of the gentleman from Indiana. It is as much an impossibility for speculators to profit by the pre-emption law if it be enforced as under the homestead. The entry in the one is for actual settlement and cultivation as in the other. The amount is limited to one hundred and sixty acres in the one as in the other. If the entry is made not for actual settlement and cultivation, but for speculation or for another person, it is a fraud upon law and void in the one as the other.

The third mode is by private entry or public sale, paying the minimum price therefor; and in this last case no limit is put upon the amount of land to be entered by any one person.

These are the three modes and only manner by which the public domain can be disposed of under the law. The minimum price of all lands save mineral is $1.25 per acre, being at least $1.05 per acre in excess of their true value. The mineral lands are from $2.50 per acre to $20. Lands lying within railroad grants are $2.50 per acre.

In 1866, when Alabama had no Representative upon this floor to look after her interest in national legislation, an act was passed withdrawing all the public lands within said State and four other southern States named in said act from sale or entry, except under the provisions of the homestead law. When it passed this House it excluded from the benefit of its provisions almost all the white population of the States to which it applied, because it required every person desiring to make a homestead entry to take the "iron-clad" oath, but that oath was stricken out in the Senate.

This act was passed ostensibly in the interest of a class of persons who had been held under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the land in a state of slavery, and who by divine Providence and the results of the late civil war had been liberated and made freemen. It was intended to secure cheap homes and lands to this unfortunate class of persons, and I make no complaint against the republican party for having passed it, for I feel a deep sympathy for these persons, and would not for any consideration advance any measure which would, in my opinion, be detrimental to them. The law has totally failed to secure the desired end. Though passed ten years ago, but few colored men in Alabama have secured homes and lands under its provisions. The reason why they have not is obvious to persons acquainted with the public lands in Alabama. These lands are too poor for a colored man to support himself and family upon. He prefers working the rich cotton lands in the southern part of the State. There are many acres of these lands in the mountain counties of North Alabama, where the enterprising European would do well. Some of these lands can be made very productive by proper fertilization and cultivation. There every variety of grains and grasses flourish, and all fruits known to the temperate zone grow abundantly. The climate is the finest on the continent; extreme heat and cold are unknown, the mean temperature being about sixty degrees, never higher than ninety-five nor lower than twenty; and that dreaded disease, the scourge of more northern climates, consumption, is an entire stranger. There, too, immigrants are most cordially invited, and will be welcomed with open arms and hearts.

But while this is true as to a portion of the public lands in Alabama, it is equally true that the great bulk of these lands are pine forests, too poor for cultivation, and coal lands which cannot be entered and utilized under the provisions of the homestead law, and will there remain a dwelling-place and shelter for wild beasts, wholly worthless forever, unless Congress repeals the act prohibiting the sale of the same. There are over five thousand square miles of superior bituminous coal lands in Alabama, a large proportion of which is now vacant. These coal lands, so long as they remain in the hands of Government, are totally valueless, producing no revenue and adding nothing to the prosperity and wealth of the country; but if sold to persons with capital sufficient to develop and mine them, they would add millions upon millions to the material wealth of the nation, and would produce a revenue far in excess of all that we may ever reasonably hope to realize from the sale of all the vast public domain, and would furnish employment to the many thousand poor laborers now out of work in the North and East at remunerative wages. If this vast and extensive coal-field was properly worked and developed, its value to the whole country could not be estimated.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the development of the coal interest of Pennsylvania has contributed more to her material prosperity than any other enterprise, unless it be that of her iron, and that would not have succeeded so well had it not been for her coal. She mines annually of bituminous and anthracite coal over 25,000,000 tons, of the value of over $60,000,000, and must give employment to over 60,000 hands. With proper encouragement from the Federal Government Alabama ought in a few years to rival this great State of Pennsylvania in the production of coal. There is no good reason, if Congress will permit her, why Alabama should not derive a larger income from her coal-mines than from her cotton-fields. These coal-fields lie equidistant between two great rivers, the Alabama and Tennessee. The southern boundary extends to within thirty-five miles of the Alabama and the northern to within fifty miles of the Tennessee. The Alabama empties into the Mobile Bay and the Tennessee into the Ohio, thus giving to the Alabama coal cheap water transportation by the one to the Gulf and by the other to the great Mississippi Valley.

The Warrior River extends through the very center of these coal-fields, and is navigable for small steamboats to Tuscaloosa during the winter and spring, and with a small expense could be made navigable the year round; and by the expenditure of about $1,000,000 it could be made navigable for coal-barges to and through the center of this great coal-field, thus giving another outlet to the Gulf. It is, therefore, seen that the coal-fields of Alabama are as favorably located for cheap transportation as those of the State of Pennsylvania. And these coals can be mined cheaper than those of that State and are in many respects equal, if not superior, to the Pennsylvania and West Virginia coals. In support of this proposition I desire to call the attention of the House to a report made by Mr. Richard P. Rothwell, after a careful survey of a portion of the coal-fields of Alabama, which was read before a meeting of the American Institute of Mining Engineers at Easton, Pennsylvania, in October, 1873. I would like very much to give this able and interesting report in full, but its great length forbids my doing so, and I shall only detain the House with a few quotations:

The above table shows that the Cahaba coals are of remarkably fine quality, being chiefly distinguished for their dryness, small amount of ash, and large amount of fixed carbon.

Some of the above coals make an excellent coke suitable for blast-furnace use, and as some of them are dry-burning coals that do not coke, they would probably work raw in the furnace. Judging from the analyses alone, we would be inclined to consider all of the Cahaba as drier-burning coals than those of Indiana or Ohio, while in reality the opposite is the case. The block coals of Ohio and Indiana, so largely used in the furnaces of the Mahoning Valley, do not coke in burning, while the Cahaba coals do, though the former contain about 3 per cent. more of volatile combustible matter and nearly 6 per cent. less fixed carbon than the latter.

It is noticeable that these Indiana and Ohio coals, ranked among the best furnace fuels we have in this country, contain on an average 2½ to 3 per cent. more moisture than the Alabama coals; in fact, the analyses would indicate that the Cahaba coal is a better fuel, and altogether an exceptionally pure coal. It has been fully proved as a steam-generator, and the coke from several of the veins was used very successfully in the smelting of iron for the cannon-foundery of the Confederate States, at Selma, during the war.

This report is more particularly in relation to the Cahaba fields, but what Mr. Rothwell has so well said of these coals will apply to the Warrior coal-fields; in fact, the latter can be mined more cheaply than the former.

To show that the Warrior coals are in every respect equal to the Cahaba, I will submit the following analyses of two of the beds in the Warrior field. First, an analysis of the Newcastle coal by Dr. Otto Wath, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, which shows the following composition:

Specific gravity	1.38
Water	.50

Volatile matter	28.24
Fixed carbon	59.69
Ash	10.92
Sulphur	.64

Second, an analysis of the Black Creek coal, by Dr. William Gesner, of Birmingham, Alabama, which shows the following composition:

Specific gravity	1.36
Water	.12
Bitumen, (volatile)	26.11
Fixed carbon	71.64
Ash	2.03
Sulphur	.10
Percentage of coke	73.67

Thus it will be seen that the Alabama coals are equal to any in America for many purposes. We have not only this extensive coal-field in Alabama, but also as fine iron ores as are found on the continent, and in inexhaustible quantities sufficient to run all the furnaces of the world to their utmost capacity for over one thousand years. There near Birmingham, Alabama, all the materials necessary for successful production of iron are in inexhaustible quantities, and in closer proximity than in any other portion of this continent; and in the opinion of competent experts iron can be manufactured there more cheaply than in any other State in America.

BIRMINGHAM.

This town is situated in the center of the great mineral regions of Alabama. Here iron ore, stone coal, and limestone of superior quality are found in inexhaustible quantities. These minerals lay in closer proximity than in any other part of the known world, so said by the mineral men who have visited this locality from not only this country but from Europe. Some idea may be learned of these resources by the following statement, which at once presents itself to the eye of the visitor: On one side of the town, not a mile from the business center, extends a mountain of iron sixty miles in length. Perpendicular ledges of solid ore may be seen in many places, and vast surfaces of solid mineral may be walked over several hundred feet above the level of the town. In close proximity to this mountain of iron are the five thousand square miles of the Warrior coal-fields and the two thousand square miles of Cahaba coal-fields, which, like the iron, is actually inexhaustible. Limestone and sandstone, fire and brick clays, marble of various colors and of superior quality, are equally abundant with the iron and coal, and most acceptable for all industrial purposes. It is not overdrawing the picture in saying there is no reason to believe but that Birmingham may some day be to the United States what Birmingham, England, is to Europe.

By the aid of northern and European capital and skill we expect (if the gentleman from Indiana will permit) to demonstrate that iron can be produced in America as cheaply as in Europe.

A company largely composed of northern men have lately put in blast a coke-furnace near said city of Birmingham, and they are turning out daily thirty-five tons of the best silver coke pig, which I am informed they can sell at a handsome profit even at the present exceedingly low prices. Many other furnaces would soon be put in operation in that section if the vacant coal lands could be purchased at reasonable prices and in large bodies, such as would justify persons or companies in extending branch railroads to them. Iron men will not invest their money in furnaces unless they can first secure large bodies of coal lands, and they cannot be had there unless Congress passes the bill now under consideration, and thereby unlocks them and puts them upon the market. We ask the West, without regard to party, to assist us in the passage of this bill, and thereby remove a restriction which most materially retards the iron interest of Alabama. Repeal the law of 1866, and you will have done much to forward the interest of the entire people of Alabama, and will have given an impetus to her iron and mining interests which in a few years will add millions to the wealth of the country. Repeal that law, and she will soon furnish cheap coal and iron to the farmers of the West, and in return will give them a market for the produce of their farms.

There have been in that State six or seven charcoal blast-furnaces in operation, and many others in all probability would have been constructed if a sufficient amount of timber lands could have been purchased at reasonable prices in locations favorable for the business. But under the law of 1866 no public lands could be had for that purpose at any price. For the successful operation of such furnaces large bodies of woodland are required. It is utterly impossible to operate successfully one of those furnaces with only one hundred and sixty acres from which to supply it with fuel. To forbid entries of the public lands excepting under the homestead law is to virtually prohibit the further increase of the production of charcoal-iron in Alabama. Any gentleman upon this floor at all familiar with this subject will bear witness to the truth of what I have said in relation to the absolute necessity of large bodies of woodland for charcoal-furnaces.

This act of 1866 does not only affect injuriously our iron and coal interests, but it materially retards the lumber business in our section. A very large percentage of the fine timber lands there are vacant, and if they could be entered in large quantities, very soon a considerable lumber business would spring up, which would increase largely the wealth and strength of the country.

The income from this business in Alabama ought to be, annually, twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars. But this business, like that of the charcoal, requires large bodies of land, as no person could afford the expense of putting a saw-mill in operation with nothing but a homestead entry from which to supply the mill with logs. The lumber cut from the long-leaf yellow pine of Alabama is of a superior quality, and can be laid down in the western cities even by railroad transportation as cheaply as an inferior lumber now in those markets; and when the Tennessee River shall have been made navigable above the shoals, which will be done in a few years, thereby giving us cheap water transportation to the Mississippi Valley, Alabama lumber could be put in all of said cities at prices far below those now paid for an inferior article from the more favored sections of the country.

Thus it will be seen that the whole West is vitally interested in building up this business in Alabama, and instead of her representatives retarding, they should foster and encourage it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask any fair-minded gentleman upon this floor, of either political party, if he believes it to be right and just to foster and protect the iron, coal, and lumber businesses in one section by friendly legislation and to retard and clog them in another section by hostile legislation? To refuse to repeal the law of 1866 would be to wrong, to cruelly wrong the State I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. Sir, in the name of an honest and patriotic constituency I most respectfully ask a favorable consideration of the bill now before the House. Upon its passage, as I heretofore said, depends in a great degree the future prosperity and glory of the State of Alabama. All her representatives of both political parties favor its passage and all her citizens demand it. I demand for Alabama every right and privilege extended by law to the other States of this Union, nothing more, and will be content with nothing less.

The act of 1866 is obnoxious, because it denies to the citizens of the States named the equal privileges enjoyed by their fellow-countrymen of other States with respect to the public lands within their borders.

Mr. MOREY. I yield now to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to have opposed this bill had it come before the House with the amendment of the Committee on Public Lands confining its operation exclusively to agricultural lands; but coming as it does without that amendment, its principle seems to me radically wrong and opposed to the policy inaugurated by the republican party during the war and adhered to since that time with ever-increasing tenacity, that the public domain is held by the Government as a sacred trust for the benefit of the landless and should be disposed of to actual settlers only. It repeals a section of the Revised Statutes which confines the disposal of the public lands in certain southern States to the provisions of the homestead law and not merely provides that they shall be open to pre-emption, but worse still, provides that they shall, as soon as practicable, be offered at public sale, and after being so offered be open to private entry.

Mr. GAUSE. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the lands in Kansas are not excluded from private entry?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. In reply to the gentleman's question, I have to inform him that while the law allowing the sale of public lands still stands on our statute-books, the policy of the Government for the last ten years has not been to offer lands at public sale, and until they are offered at public sale they never can be opened to private entry. But this bill not merely leaves them in the hands of the Land Department, but provides that as soon as practicable the lands shall be offered for sale. That is the difference. This makes it imperative. It is not left to the discretion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who I am glad to say will never order any agricultural lands in any portion of our country to be offered at public sale so as to throw open the door to speculation.

Mr. GAUSE. All the lands in Arkansas, Alabama, and I presume Louisiana and Florida, which would be embraced in this bill, have already been offered at public and private sale time and time again, even down to twelve and one-half cents an acre under the graduation act, and have not been sold.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I am glad that they have not been entered, and if they are agricultural lands I hope they never will be. And, as a gentleman beside me suggests, that was before the war.

Mr. GAUSE. I would further inquire of the gentleman if the lands in Kansas are confined to homestead entries alone?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. They are confined to homestead and pre-emption, and are not in general open to private entry. No general sale of public lands has been made in my State during the last ten years.

Mr. GAUSE. This bill does not preclude homestead entries any more than the general law now in force in Kansas and every other State in the Union.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. That may be so on the face of the bill; but by making the public sale imperative I am persuaded that its object is to open the door to land speculators and enable them to procure another slice of our public lands and deprive the poor man, who has only his labor to depend upon, of that which under the present policy is held for his use. The intent of the section was evidently to give to the poor men of the South, white and black, an opportunity to become land-owners through the operation of the homestead law; and I am opposed to its repeal and to any law that in any respect would restrict its operations in any section of the country.

Coming as I do from a section where the public lands are not all gone, I have been able to see the beneficent workings of our present system, and have learned in the school of experience to thoroughly believe in our present homestead law; and I would, instead of restricting its operations, extend it to all our public domain and provide that no public land suitable for agricultural purposes shall ever hereafter be disposed of except under that law.

My own State, Kansas, is a fine example of what the homestead law is doing for the West, and its rapid growth since the war from one hundred and fifty thousand people to nearly three-quarters of a million has been the result of its workings, and especially of those provisions of it that offered special inducements to the gallant soldiers of the Union Army, and has given us the finest population that ever filled a western State. Kansas is pre-eminently the offspring of this system, and her representatives would be recreant to duty if they would in any degree consent to the modification or repeal of the act in any portion of our common country. There is no reason why the Government should attempt to make money from the sale of these lands. As a question of public policy, looking to the general good, it is better for the Government to have all our public domain settled, to give it to the industrious pioneer, whose labors make it valuable, than to have a few millions paid into the Treasury by speculators and capitalists who will hold the land till they can wring the money they have paid with a round interest from the persons who desire it for practical use. The Government must act for the benefit of the people, for the ulterior good, and we cannot afford to take a single step backward. In this House and before its committees I have had occasion heretofore to express my views, and I have urged that it is our duty, even in reference to Indian reservations which are to be sold in trust for the benefit of the Indians, to put them at such a price and upon such terms that settlers can afford to purchase, and that they be sold to bona fide settlers only, and I am glad that such has been the disposition of the House. Early in the session, when this bill was before the House in another shape and recommitted, it was said that the Committee on Public Lands had before them a proposition to repeal the pre-emption act which would be reported, and that hereafter all lands should be disposed of under the homestead law alone. This has not been done, but instead comes this proposition in a new shape, to squander the remaining portion of the public lands in the South and sell them at public auction to the highest bidder. It is a return to the old system which was in operation years ago, and I am surprised that a republican Senate should have given sanction to it. So far as my own vote is concerned, I am determined in land legislation to take no step backward, and shall vote only for such measures as seem to me in the line of legislation we have pursued since Andrew Johnson and the other men who co-operated with him passed the homestead law for the benefit of the poor against the rich, the actual settler against the speculator.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the assurance was not given when this bill was in the House before that it would be reported back by the committee confined to timber lands and excluding agricultural lands?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Certainly, as I have already said, that was the assurance given and the understanding when the bill was recommitted.

Mr. MOREY. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL,] a member of the committee.

Mr. McDILL. Mr. Speaker, but for the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands, which have reported this bill favorably, I might not feel it my duty to say anything on the subject under consideration. But this bill occupies a changed condition and status from what it did formerly. When the bill was last before the House an amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the effect of which was to confine the provisions of the bill simply to lands not agricultural, reserving the agricultural lands to the homesteaders as heretofore. But I understand and believe that it is the intention of the committee to demand the previous question on the bill without any amendments, and I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that if the previous question be sustained without the Holman amendment, the effect will be to subject all the lands in the South to immediate sale.

Now, there is some merit in the claim of gentlemen from the Southern States that there ought not to be a special rule applied to their lands which is not applicable to all the public lands in every part of the Union; but if the rule applicable to the Southern States should be the general rule, then the way to make the law uniform is to make the rule which now prevails in the Southern States applicable to the lands in other States; then all the agricultural lands in the country would be left for homestead settlement. I apprehend that there are very few gentlemen here who have not given the matter any special attention who realize how nearly our agricultural lands are exhausted. I was myself very much surprised on learning from gentlemen who had made geological and geographical surveys in the West that there is only left in the Western Territories near 5 per cent. of the agricultural lands of all the lands remaining. They are mostly lands that can never be cultivated. There are a great many acres that can never be cultivated, and if the lands that remain unoccupied in the West that may be irrigated and made arable by great labor and great expense when reclaimed are so insignificant in quantity, the question still remains, it is said, not how many cattle can be fed on an acre, but how many acres you must assign to each head of cattle.

Now, when the agricultural lands are nearly exhausted, it certainly is right and proper that we should reserve them for the laboring population of this country. A land-holder always makes a good citizen. By owning land a poor man can obtain position and influence; and we ought to reserve the agricultural lands for the poor men of the country who are unable to pay for them. Now, the Holman amendment proposes that this bill should not apply to agricultural lands; but if the committee is sustained and the previous question ordered and the bill passed, as recommended by the committee, Congress will say that all the lands in the South, without reference to whether they are agricultural lands or not, may at once be taken up by private entry.

I call the attention of the House to the fact that when this bill or a similar one was under consideration a month ago, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who is not now present, stated that there were companies in the Northwest who would immediately take up all the lands that were timber lands.

Mr. LANE. How about the pre-emption law?

Mr. McDILL. This bill would open the lands to private entry, and capitalists would take advantage of it to secure all the best timber lands, and that, too, at a merely nominal sum.

Mr. LANE. Do I understand the gentleman to be in favor of repealing the pre-emption laws?

Mr. McDILL. I believe that the pre-emption law in connection with the homestead law is a wise one. When this bill was before the House heretofore, I asked that it might be recommitted and its provisions reconsidered in order to avoid abuses.

Mr. LANE. Does not the gentleman know that the homestead law has the worst features of the pre-emption law?

Mr. McDILL. I am not defending any of the bad features or abuses of the homestead system, but on this I plant myself, and I feel that I can stand surely on that, that these lands should be reserved for the poor men of the country under the homestead law; and if that law does not secure that purpose it is the duty of Congress to amend it. If the law does not accomplish that, it should be the duty of Congress to amend the law and so change it that there may be no abuses under it. This bill, as I understand it, without the Holman amendment being adopted, will have the effect of placing the whole of the lands of the South, which are the most valuable lands we now have, at immediate sale, to be taken up by men of capital. But there is almost no hope for poor men in the West. They can find but few homesteads in that direction. The agricultural lands are almost gone now.

The gentlemen of the South, if this bill passes without amendment, will soon find that 90 per cent. of their lands are in the hands of corporations and timber speculators. If this bill is passed, I here prophesy that in a short time the poor men of the South will have no chance to make themselves land-holders. I do hope that gentlemen will reflect before they support this bill in its present shape.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MOREY. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. MONEY.]

Mr. MONEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill as reported by the committee is advocated by every gentleman on this floor from the Southern States having lands now subjected to the homestead restriction law, and that, too, without regard to politics.

It may be presumed that gentlemen from the South are as much interested in the welfare of the people they represent as the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL,] and their colleagues can possibly be. We recognize equally with those gentlemen the necessity of identifying the black people and the poor white people of the South with the interests of the country. We know that local attachment is one of the elements of patriotism, and that it is impossible for a man to have that love of country disconnected with the soil that he would have if he had a personal interest in that soil. We will not advocate here any measure that does not look to the good of the black and the white people alike.

What we ask, however, is that the States of the South in this respect shall be put upon an equal footing with the other States of the Union. Why are not the restrictions of this homestead law extended to the other States? There is no reason, except the hot temper which followed the war, and which showed itself in the legislation prepared in this Hall. This restriction was placed upon the lands in Mississippi and the other States named in this bill as a measure of persecution against the white people of these States. Gentlemen who advocated this law made the statement on this floor that they would not only place these lands, the property of the United States, at the disposal of the colored people, but they would confiscate the lands owned by the leading rebels, as they called them, and the State lands for the same purpose. The advocates of the homestead law as applied to these States not only favored this measure, but also favored the taking of the lands in Texas in which the United States never had any interest.

As regards the value of the homestead law, why should it not be secured to the people of all the United States without respect to color? It has passed into a proverb that what is lightly won is lightly held. That only is held dear which is secured by one's own exertions by the sweat of the brow. You may shower gifts on a people, but if they have not energy and industry to win these lands for themselves they will not be able to hold them if given to them; they will soon pass into the hands of their creditors.

I have a communication from the Department stating that of the 40,000,000 acres of land in the Southern States, only 8,000,000 have been entered under the homestead law, of which 2,000,000 have been relinquished; and of the 6,000,000 remaining patents have been secured for but 1,000,000 acres. This shows that there is no disposition on the part of the colored people to avail themselves of the benefits of this law.

This restriction named in this bill acts as a check upon those who would otherwise invest capital in lands in the Southern States. Without this restriction those lands would not go to great speculators, for there are no great bodies of land lying together; but the land is in detached fragments all over the States, and the greater portion of it is not fit for agricultural purposes. If they had been agricultural lands, they would have long since passed under the plow.

Most of the lands are valuable merely for the timber that is upon them, and under the restrictions placed upon these States these lands are virtually kept out of the market. The people cannot avail themselves of the privilege of buying these lands at a fixed price; they are not open to the location of land warrants by soldiers who served in the wars of the United States; they are not open to agriculturists or to those who would enter upon them for the purpose of developing their mineral resources. They are lying as a dead weight upon the States, and will lie there until the crack of doom, if you wait for the enterprise of a population which have shown no disposition to avail themselves of the privileges given by this law.

Yet, gentlemen upon this floor would seem to claim that they understand the nature of our country, the disposition of our people, and the condition of our affairs better than we do ourselves. We claim at least to know what is for the interest of our people and what is the condition of our country. We at least may be credited with having their interest at heart as much as gentlemen who have no knowledge of them whatever and would enforce restrictions upon them.

This question has come up this morning without notice. I had designed when it came up to refer to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] particularly his allusion to the benefit to be derived from placing the whole country under the operation of the homestead law. He had the boldness to state that the great strength of the Roman Empire lay in the fact of its agrarian law, which secured to each citizen a portion of the territory. The gentleman has studied history without studying its philosophy. He ought to know that there never was an agrarian law enforced in Rome, that all the territory was public property, and that those who had the possessory interest in the land could alienate only that possessory interest, and not the title. He even said that the fall of the empire dated from the death of the Gracchi slain in the disturbances caused by the agitation of the agrarian law.

The gentleman knows very well that it was an incident to the disturbances of those times that the downfall of Roman liberty dated not from the time the Gracchi were slain, but from the time when Tiberius Gracchus violated the sanctity of the person of a tribune of the people, and with unlawful hands hurled him from his seat to be beaten by the stones of the populace.

And in this and every other country from the time when the forms of law are held in disrespect by its officers, may we date the decadence of liberty and free institutions. Contempt for the forms of law marks the rude beginning or the corrupt condition of government hastening to its fall.

Gentlemen who take this ground here must show either that there is a man from the South on this floor who is not desirous of making the colored man a citizen in every respect or he must admit that we are anxious to educate him, to fix him upon the land, and to give him an interest in the soil of the country.

Prior to the war there was incorporated into the law of Mississippi and other southern States an exemption which extended not only to lands and horses but to negroes. It has ever been the policy of those States to make every citizen interested in every species of its property. It is so to-day; and there is not another State in this Union that has an exemption law so liberal as that of the State of Mississippi. We are not only willing but desirous that the colored men of Mississippi should have homesteads and schools. As they are citizens we desire that they shall be good citizens, and are willing to furnish them with every appliance that will tend to make them such. We would have them identified with our institutions, with our soil, with our free-school policy, with everything that would elevate them in the scale of material and moral being.

It is a little remarkable for gentlemen from other sections of this Union to come here and instruct the people of the South upon their duty to their constituents. I came here by virtue of an election at which I received 4,000 colored votes, and I may be presumed to understand as well their interest and to be as anxious to promote it as any man from any other quarter of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, it is a fact worthy of some consideration that there is no division of opinion in reference to this bill among the Representatives from the five States interested. Democrats and republicans alike favor its provisions. Every one of them is in favor of removing these restrictions, because we all know that those States cannot run the race of material progress manacled and hampered as they are with such restrictions as these. We are anxious to put these lands upon the market. We want to invite immigration from all sections of the Union. We want to say to the people everywhere, Come and take these lands and settle them.

Gentlemen talk as though, if this bill should pass, the homestead law will not apply to these States. They certainly have not examined the matter or they would see their mistake. We do not intend to deprive anybody of any rights under the homestead law. We simply propose to remove these restrictions which prevent the land not taken as homesteads from being open to purchasers from whatever quarter they may come. If gentlemen had studied the condition of things there, they would know that there is little disposition, especially among the colored people of the South, to go into the wild woods and settle. They would rather give $100 an acre for good land already cleared and settled than accept as a free gift land in the woods. I know whereof I speak, for I have myself offered to the colored people working on my place to give them lands if they would clear them, and they have never yet availed themselves of that proposition. I offered to give one-half of two thousand acres to anybody who would clear it; but not a solitary colored man has ever entered on that land.

Mr. Speaker, we think these States should not labor under restrictions and impediments to their progress which are not placed upon other States of the Union. We can see no good reason why the population of those States should be made an exception from the policy pursued with reference to other States. I venture to say that there are to-day as little distress and poverty among the poorer people of the Southern States of both classes as will be found in any other section of this Union. I will also venture to say that there is just as large a class in proportion to population in the Northwestern States who are without homesteads and without any provision to secure them as can be found to-day in the Southern States.

We ask the attention of gentlemen to the bill before the House, for we are assured that if they consult the interests of the very people whose protection they profess to have in view they will see that the policy which has been pursued in regard to these Southern States does not operate to the benefit of that class.

Another fact in relation to the State of Mississippi should be borne in mind. One-sixth of its whole area has been forfeited to the State for taxes; and these lands can be had by simply paying the taxes due upon them. Lands are sold every year for taxes; and thus there is an opportunity which people who have no homes can avail themselves of. Under our laws the titles conveyed by these tax sales are as good as any title that can be made. But our people have shown no disposition to avail themselves of these lands; and there is no reason whatever why this check upon the progress of the Southern States should be continued. We contend that we are competent to regulate our own affairs, to speak for our own people, to say what they need.

Mr. LYNCH. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. MONEY] a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. MONEY. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. LYNCH. It is true that the public lands in the State of Mississippi are comparatively valueless for purposes of cultivation; but under the operation of this bill would it not be possible for speculators in different parts of the country to buy up all these lands, thus preventing them from being purchased by those who would wish them for legitimate purposes except by paying more than the lands are actually worth?

Mr. MONEY. In answer to my colleague I will say that he knows or ought to know that one-sixth of the area of Mississippi has been forfeited to the State for taxes, and there is no money in Mississippi to speculate in lands or anything else. This cry of "land monopoly" is the most absurd and ridiculous ever pronounced on this floor. You might as well say that merchants have a monopoly in dealing in merchandise or that shoemakers have a monopoly in shoemaking as to say that farmers have a monopoly of the land.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] rises to a question of privilege.

SOUTH CAROLINA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee of Elections, submitted a report concluding with the following resolution; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That Joseph H. Rainey, the sitting member, was duly elected a Representative in the Forty-fourth Congress of the United States from the first congressional district of South Carolina and is entitled to the seat.

SPENCER VS. MOREY, FIFTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT, LOUISIANA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The morning hour having expired, I now call up the contested-election case of Spencer vs. Morey, from the fifth congressional district of Louisiana. After the Clerk has read the resolutions of the majority and minority I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] chairman of the subcommittee who submitted the report in this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Frank Morey was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress from the fifth district of Louisiana.

Resolved, That William B. Spencer was elected and is entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress from the fifth district of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.) The Clerk will now read the resolutions of the minority.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That William B. Spencer was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That Hon. Frank Morey was elected and is entitled to a seat in this House.

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Speaker, this contest arises from the fifth district of Louisiana, and there are only four precincts in the entire district which are seriously in controversy in this case. The parties to this contest have made certain admissions in reference to a large majority of voting places in the congressional district. It is admitted by Morey, the contestee, that in nine of the parishes Spencer, the contestant, received 3,944 majority, and Spencer, the contestant, admits that in four of said parishes Morey received 2,548. It results from the admissions and agreements of the parties that Spencer, the contestant, enters the contested territory with a majority of 1,396 votes in his favor. The fifth ward of Concordia Parish and the first, second, and third wards of Carroll Parish comprise the territory that is disputed here.

In order to a proper understanding of this case it is necessary that the House should have some general idea of the election laws of Louisiana.

In the first place it is provided that three commissioners, selected from different political parties, and of good standing in the party to which they severally belong, are to preside over and conduct the election—one of their number to be by them selected to act as clerk. Before entering upon their duties, each one of them is to take and subscribe an oath that he will "faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning-officer as prescribed by law;" that he will "carefully canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election."

They are to receive the ballots of all legal voters, and deposit the same in the ballot-box, and this they are to do "in the full and convenient view of the voter himself." Each voter has "the right to deposit his own vote in the ballot-box with his own hand." It is made a misdemeanor for any commissioner to receive a ballot from any other hand than that of the voter himself, or for any other person than the voter himself to hand a ballot to a commissioner. A list of persons voting is to be kept, numbered from one to the end, said list to be signed and sworn to by the commissioners before leaving the place or opening the ballot-box. The votes are to be counted by them immediately after the close of the election without moving the box from the place where the election was held, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. Tally-lists of the count are also required to be kept, and, after the count, the ballots counted are to be put back into the box and preserved until after the next term of the criminal or district court, as the case may be. They are to make a list of the names of all persons voted for; the offices for which they were supported; the number of votes received by each; the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor. They are then to make out duplicates of such lists, to be signed and sworn to by them; one of said duplicates to be delivered to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and the other to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and this is to be done by all or one of the commissioners in person, within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls.

To the supervisor of registration, as we have seen, one of the duplicate returns is to be delivered within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. This supervisor of registration, when the returns from the different wards in the parish are made to him, is required within twenty-four hours thereafter to compile or consolidate the same, and this consolidated return is to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court. The supervisor is then to forward these consolidated returns, together with the originals received by him from the commissioners, to the State returning board, the same to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and sent by mail.

The State returning board is to be composed of five persons, selected from all political parties. They are to meet in New Orleans within ten days after the election to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of elections and make returns of the election to the secretary of state, the returns to be compiled in duplicate; one copy to be filed with the secretary of state, and of the other they are to make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they deem proper, declaring the result of the election. These returns of the State returning board are made prima facie evidence of election.

There are various and specific provisions in reference to disorder, intimidation, illegal voting, and fraud, to some of which are affixed heavy penalties—all intended to protect the elector in a fair and untrammeled exercise of his right to vote, and to guard the ballot-box from improper influences.

The first section of the act containing these election laws says that elections "shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and no other."

That is a brief abstract of the election law of Louisiana.

I will take up briefly, Mr. Speaker, the fifth ward of Concordia Parish, and give in a succinct form the points which arise on that ward. The election law, as has been seen, requires that the vote shall be counted at the voting-precinct. The election officers are expressly directed not to remove the box from the voting-precinct until every vote is counted out, and that in the presence of such citizens or bystanders as may see fit to be present to witness the count. In this case in Concordia Parish, fifth ward, the officers, after the election was over, without counting the vote as they were directed by law to do, took the ballot-box, the election closing about sundown, and went sixteen miles to Vidalia, the county seat of Concordia Parish, arriving there between eleven and twelve o'clock that night, took the ballot-box into an up-stairs room in the court-house, and proceeded to count the votes. They counted until about two o'clock that night, when, becoming fatigued, they adjourned until the following morning. One of the commissioners, Dameron, says he took the ballot-box with him to his hotel and kept it under his bed until the next morning, when they again retired to the court-house and recommenced to count the vote. They occupied the tax-collector's office in the court-house.

Now, this conduct of these commissioners, in view of the strict and specific terms of the election law of Louisiana, to wit, that the ballot-box should not be removed from the place where the ballots were cast until all the votes were counted, is, to say the least of it, rather extraordinary. Dameron, one of the commissioners, who is introduced in this case by both parties and whose statement is admitted by both, says that at the close of the election he proposed to count the votes at the precinct where they were cast, but that the other two commissioners, two colored men, Columbus and Jefferson, refused to count the vote at the voting-precinct, and, having no book there to guide them as to the law, he yielded to their wishes in the premises, and they made this nocturnal journey to Vidalia in consequence with the ballot-box, arriving there about twelve o'clock that night.

Jefferson and Columbus both deny the statement of Dameron as to the cause of their trip to Vidalia. They deny that they refused to count the vote at the voting-precinct. So that when we seek for the cause of this strange violation of the election law of the State of Louisiana in the statements of the commissioners themselves, we are met with a conflict on the part of those commissioners as to why they took this ordinary trip that night to the county seat. Jefferson denies that he refused to count the votes at the voting-precinct, as Dameron says. Columbus likewise denies the statement of Dameron that he refused to count the vote there. Precisely how the fact is on this subject we are unable to tell. But one thing is certain, they must have discussed and did discuss the propriety of counting the votes at the place where they were polled; but for some reason they did not count them there, but took the ballot-boxes to the county seat, to Vidalia.

Well, whatever may be thought as to whether this portion of the election law of Louisiana requiring the vote to be counted where it is polled is directory or mandatory, whatever may be thought of that, I think there can be no two opinions upon this proposition, that the election law of Louisiana requiring that the commissioners themselves should count the vote is certainly imperative. In the brief synopsis of the election law of Louisiana that I referred to a while ago, it is required of the commissioners that they shall keep tally-sheets, and the commissioners themselves are required to take an oath (which is rather an extraordinary provision of the law of Louisiana) that they will carefully count the vote that has been cast in any election over which they may preside. That they are sworn to do. That, then, I take it, is certainly imperative. What the State of Louisiana considered of sufficient importance to require her election officers to take an oath to solemnly perform, I think there can be no doubt that that part of the law is certainly imperative.

The law of Louisiana furthermore makes it a felony, a penitentiary offense, for any man who is not an officer of election to interfere in any manner with the counting of votes or the making of returns of election in that State. Let me show briefly what was done in this case. When they got to Vidalia, the county seat, Mr. Dameron says they called in such bystanders as they could pick up—to do what? To keep the tally-sheets of that election. Now, what are tally-sheets? They are marks on a paper from which the count of the election is made. If the tally-sheets are correct, the count is correct. If the tally-sheets are incorrect, the count taken from them is necessarily erroneous. Now, what do these commissioners do according to their own statement? When they get to Vidalia, instead of carefully counting that vote as the law required them to swear they would do, and as they did swear they would do, they sat down there in that court-house and called on the irresponsible, the unsworn, the unofficial bystanders in the court-house to perform the all-important function of keeping that tally-list, and from that tally-list their return was made up.

Now, I take the broad ground that any election law which would allow sworn officers of election to call in irresponsible bystanders to keep the tally-list, which is virtually the count—that any law which would tolerate a thing of that kind would be simply a mockery; and that if this House will recognize returns thus made up and thus arrived at, they will throw wide open the doors to fraud and there will be no security of election. Why, Mr. Speaker, what does it avail that the Legislature of a State shall go on and make the most minute and specific provision as this law of Lousiana does, for it is certainly the most stringent election law that ever came under my observation; of what avail is it that the Legislature shall provide against bribery, and provide against intimidation, and provide against fraud, if after the voters have come up to cast their ballots and have voted as they desired to vote, you should then allow the commissioners of election to take their ballot-boxes and call in unsworn and unofficial bystanders to count votes? If the votes are not correctly counted, it is all in vain that they have ever been cast.

But who are these men that kept this tally-sheet? We do not know anything about them except their names. The law requires that the commissioners shall be taken from both political parties. What political party did these keepers of the tally-list belong to? The evidence does not inform us. Were they men of character? The evidence does not inform us. They certainly were not officers of election; and if their acts are entitled to any validity at all, they must rest upon proof aliunde; they have no legal presumption to lean upon for support. There is no presumption in favor of the correctness of the count of these unofficial bystanders who were called in to keep the tally-sheets in the fifth ward of Concordia Parish; none whatever.

If, therefore, there were nothing else in the case except the fact that these commissioners had so far departed from their duty as to call in unsworn, unofficial bystanders to discharge the most important functions with which the law had clothed them in connection with this election, I should certainly refuse to receive their return. But that is not all. I desire not to be tedious, but I must call the attention of the House to what Dameron says in reference to the manner in which these tally-sheets were kept. He admits the calling in of three men—Mr. Connell, Mr. Joyce, and Mr. Nutt—to do what? Virtually to count the vote at ward No. 5, Concordia Parish; for that is the office these men Joyce, Nutt, and Connell performed. As I said before, we do not know who they are. Even their testimony was not taken to show that the tally was complete. We have not even the benefit of their affidavits. Dameron says that we have heard of but two of the candidates complain of the manner in which they counted the votes. That is neither here nor there; it is of no account; and if this House recognizes a thing of that sort, they will give away the security of all elections, if you allow that sworn commissioners shall violate the law which imposes on them certain duties, and to transfer them to unsworn, unofficial, and irresponsible persons, unknown to the law. It was a penitentiary offense for these men to come in, and if you will recognize anything of that sort, you will have no security as to the results of elections.

Dameron says:

> I only heard two candidates make objections to our mode and manner of counting. No objection by anybody else was made to me. The votes cast at the fifth-ward box were counted and returned by the supervisor, as between all the candidates at said election. I don't think the tally-lists were very regularly kept, as we had no regular tally-keepers, and had to pick them up as we could get them. I believe the tally-lists were kept as correctly as they could have been kept under the circumstances.

The other two managers corroborate him in every particular.

Now here was a sworn commissioner who is placed over a ballot-box to conduct the elections, and what does he do? When he comes up with the returns, he tells you that they had to pick up such men as they could get. Why did he have to pick up anybody? He talks as if an injunction had been served upon him to pick up somebody—to do what? To do what the law required him to do and which he had taken an oath to do. He not only was not required to pick anybody up, but in doing so he violated the law, and I insist that he destroyed the correctness of the returns. There being no other result from that parish, the committee properly excluded it. So much for that, for I must hurry on.

Now the next contested precinct is the first ward of Carroll Parish. I want to state to the House one very extraordinary fact in reference to the entire parish of Carroll. The law requires that within twenty-four hours after the close of the election the ballot-boxes, with the ballots in them, and the returns of the commissioners shall be deposited in the office of the clerk of the district court. The proof in this case shows that in every single precinct in that entire parish the law was never complied with, and that, so far as that depositary fixed by law, to wit, the clerk of the district court, was concerned, you could not ascertain the election that had been held in Carroll Parish. The returns and ballot-boxes and all the proof of the election that the law requires to be deposited in that office had been spirited away, stolen by somebody, if they were ever placed there; they were certainly not there. The deputy clerk who is in charge of the office says that he never saw any of the returns, but there were forged returns by somebody, but who that somebody was will appear when I come to the third ward in Carroll Parish.

Now Anderson, one of the commissioners at ward No. 3 in Carroll Parish, while they were taking proof produced from his pocket what purported to be a duplicate return from precinct No. 1—he says he got it from Jackson, the clerk, and Jackson was one of the commissioners of ward No. 1; why he gave it to Anderson does not appear—when the election contest came up Mr. Anderson pulls this return from his pocket. Now, the three commissioners that were present on the day of election swear that what Anderson produced is a correct statement of the votes cast at ward No. 1 in Carroll Parish, and if there were nothing else in reference to ward No. 1 I should be inclined to receive that as the return and accept it in the shape in which it came. But what other informality attaches to that return? Why, it is in proof here that this man David Jackson, who was one of the commissioners at ward No. 1, who was clerk of the district court, a man who ought to have had custody of all the returns of the election, was detected during the progress of the election in changing ballots from one side to the other. He received ballots at a window. That window was six feet from the ground. You will remember that under the law of Louisiana a ballot may be received by an officer of election or that the voter has a right to put his ballot into the box. They held the election at a window six feet from the ground, so that it was impossible for the voter to reach the ballot-box and from where it was impossible to ascertain what the commissioner did with the ballot so deposited when he received it. Well, now, Jackson was detected in changing ballots. He was also proven to have handed out greenbacks to voters, and he was one of the commissioners. Now, it is a well-settled rule—I am not quoting law on the subject, for it is unnecessary—that where the commissioner is detected in irregularities of this kind the return at that box must be rejected. Why? Because you cannot tell how far that commissioner's fraud has vitiated that ballot-box. For other reasons, into which I will not go and which will be covered in a further discussion of the case, the first-ward returns of Carroll Parish were excluded.

Now, in reference to the second ward, there never were any returns from that ward; none have been found in this case. There is no proof to show what became of them. The returns sent to the State board were found to have been forged. The three county commissioners swear that their names to the returns sent to the State board were forgeries.

The county supervisor swears that he never put these returns before the State returning board and that he never authorized any person to do so. Mr. W. W. Benham, who was one of the commissioners of this ward, admits that he put these returns before the State returning board at New Orleans. It is clearly shown, as I think, by the proof that he was the man who committed the forgery. He was one of the commissioners of election at this ward No. 2 in Carroll Parish. It is upon his evidence and upon the vague recollections of one or two others that the result of the election in the second ward in Carroll Parish is sought to be established. The committee believe that the evidence is wholly insufficient to show the result of the election in that ward.

Now in reference to the third ward. I will hasten on, as I do not wish to consume the time of the House; and I think I am not doing so, but rather consuming myself. There have been no returns from the third ward at all. The result of the election in that ward depends upon the testimony of this man Anderson, who drew from his pocket these returns from the first ward, and the affidavit that was made before the State returning board. To sum it up in a word, the evidence, outside of any returns from this third ward of Carroll Parish, is wholly insufficient to establish the vote there. The testimony of no voter is taken to show how he voted. No attempt is made in the absence of the returns to arrive at the result in any of these precincts, except the uncertain and indistinct memory of parties and witnesses whose testimony was taken months after the election, and which witnesses do not agree as to the result of the vote.

The result that the majority of the Committee of Elections arrive at is simply this: We have already seen that, excluding the contested territory, Spencer had, by agreement of the parties, a majority of 1,396. The fifth ward of Concordia Parish, and the first, second, and third wards of Carroll Parish, being excluded by this report, that majority still stands, to be affected only by the vote at the fourth and fifth wards of Carroll Parish. Adding to the majority (1,396) with which Spencer entered the contested territory, the majority of 12, which he received at the fifth ward, would make his majority 1,408, from which is to be deducted 93 votes, the majority received by Morey at the fourth ward, thus electing Spencer by a majority of 1,315 votes.

There are a great many facts in this case which bear upon it, but I have not deemed it advisable in the brief opening of the case to allude to them; they will be brought to the attention of the House further along in the case.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, in presenting the views of the minority of the Committee of Elections in reference to this case of Spencer vs. Morey, I call the attention of the House to the fact that the contestant and contestee agree as to the respective majorities received in all of the parishes outside of Concordia and Carroll Parishes; and we therefore have nothing to do with any parish in that congressional district except Concordia and Carroll. We have nothing to do with even Concordia Parish, except as regards poll 5; and the committee agree as to all the polls in Carroll Parish except the first, second, and third polls; in other words the committee accept, as to the fourth and fifth polls of Carroll Parish, the exhibit made by the official returns.

In the first instance, I desire to examine the objections that have been urged by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] my colleague on the Committee of Elections, in regard to the fifth poll of Concordia Parish. The ground of objection urged against the reception of the vote of this poll is that the ballots were not counted at the place when they were received before the ballot-box was removed. The law requires that the ballots shall be counted immediately at the close of the polls at the places where they are received, and before the boxes are removed. We agree and admit that the ballot-box was removed from this poll before the vote was counted.

Now let us examine the law covering this subject. The minority of the committee claim that the law in this particular is directory, and not mandatory. In reference to that I would refer to the decision of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana, which court has adjudicated this identical election law and declared that the provisions regulating the form and manner of conducting the election are simply directory, and not mandatory. Therefore, even if the law was not strictly complied with, it would not justify this House in excluding that vote, unless there was some fraud or the real merits of the election were affected by the disregard of the law.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the exact vote as agreed upon. It is agreed by the contestant and contestee that, excluding poll 5 of Concordia Parish and the entire vote of Carroll Parish, Spencer, the contestant, has a majority of 2,548.

In considering the fifth poll of Concordia Parish, I wish the House to bear in mind that there are but four witnesses called in reference to this poll. Mr. Dameron, who is a witness for contestant and contestee, and who is a partisan friend of Spencer, the contestant, testifies that the election was fair and honest, and that everything was done in accordance with the law up to the time that the poll closed; that so far as this poll is concerned there were no irregularities; there were no violations of law; there were no frauds. In this he is corroborated by all the witnesses, and the only pretext for rejecting this poll is that when the poll was closed the law was violated in the particular that the vote was not counted there upon the spot before removing the box.

Now, what are the facts? When they had closed the election Mr. Dameron, Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Columbus, the commissioners, consulted together as to the counting of the vote. Mr. Jefferson, who had been an officer of elections previous to this one, stated to Dameron: "I have been a commissioner before, and the law requires that we shall take the box to the county site and there count the vote." Mr. Dameron testified that, having no book to guide their action, they accepted the statement of Mr. Jefferson, and they all agreed that they would remove the box from the polling-place to the county site, a distance of sixteen miles. The three commissioners locked the box and gave the key into the possession of Dameron, the contestant's partisan friend, and all three started in company on their road to the county site. After they had ridden some ten or twelve miles, one of them being in a buggy and the others on horseback, it was suggested that Mr. Columbus give Mr. Dameron, who was in the buggy, the box. Mr. Columbus gave the box to Mr. Dameron, Spencer's partisan friend, who had the key, and they continued on till they reached the county site. Having arrived there, they commenced to count the vote. They counted till two o'clock, and then they adjourned. Dameron, Spencer's partisan friend, took the box with him, locked, to the hotel, and placed it under his bed. The next morning early they commenced to count the vote, and continued until the whole vote was counted and the returns made.

What more? The record will bear me out in the assertion that if there was or could have been any fraud committed it must have been committed by Mr. Dameron, Mr. Spencer's friend. He is the only one who had the opportunity to commit fraud. The majority of the committee hold to the doctrine that because there was opportunity to commit fraud the House must infer that fraud was committed. I defy the majority of the committee to show one word of evidence in this entire record raising even a presumption of fraud in this case. On the contrary, Mr. Dameron testifies that the election was fair and free; that the law was complied with in every particular, except as to counting the vote at the polling-place.

In order that the House may see that I do not misquote the evidence, I read a portion of Mr. Dameron's testimony. He says:

> Robert H. Columbus and Thomas E. D. Jefferson were the other two commissioners at said poll, and William C. Yarger United States supervisor at that poll. When the polls were closed on that day between six and seven o'clock p. m., the box was locked. I took the key in my possession, giving the box to Robert H. Columbus. * * * When we closed the box I locked it and gave the key to Thomas H. Columbus, taking the box with me, in company with William C. Yarger, United States supervisor, to the hotel in Vidalia. * * * The reason we did not go to the court-room at first was that, on arriving at Vidalia, we found the court-room occupied by the commissioners of the Vidalia ward or precinct. * * * There were in said box and returned by said commissioners 441 votes for Frank Morey for member of Congress for fifth district and 37 votes for William B. Spencer for member of Congress for fifth district of Louisiana.

Now, where has Mr. Spencer attempted to impeach the vote absolutely and actually testified to by the commissioners? Even if the returns be rejected, there is evidence aliunde of the actual vote polled at that box. And is this House willing to defeat the voice of the electors on account of some informality on the part of the election officers, and by that means to seat the minority candidate? You must do this before you can declare that this poll shall not be counted for Mr. Morey. Every other witness testifies to the same fact that Dameron swears to; and when you bear in mind that he was a partisan friend of Spencer, the contestant, his testimony is certainly entitled to more weight than if it came from a partisan friend of the sitting member.

I now pass to the further consideration of the violation of law in respect to the removal of the box. I understand the principle to be as laid down by Mr. McCrary in his American Law of Elections, and as supported by uniform decisions in this House from the foundation of the Government to the present time, that unless the violation of the law affects the real merits the law is to be regarded as merely directory. Will this House go behind the decision of the supreme court of the State, an authority that has interpreted and adjudicated this particular election law? Will we say that such a decision is not binding upon this House, when it is regarded as binding upon the Supreme Court of the United States? The decision of the supreme tribunal of the State must be rejected before you can exclude the fifth poll of Concordia Parish.

In support of the position assumed by me that this law is directory, and not mandatory, I read from McCrary's Law of Elections, pages 126 and 127:

> If the statute expressly declares any particular act to be essential to the validity of the election, or that its omission should render the election void, all the courts whose duty it is to enforce said statutes must so hold, whether the particular act in question goes to the merits or affects the result of the election or not. But if, as in most cases, the statute simply provides that acts or things shall be done within a particular time, or in a particular way, and does not declare that their performance is essential to the validity of the election, then they will be regarded as mandatory if they do, and directory if they do not, affect the actual results of the election. * * * Those provisions which affect the time and place of holding elections and the legal qualifications of the electors are generally of the substance of the election, while those touching the record and the returns of the votes received are directory. The principle is that irregularities which do not tend to affect the results are not to defeat the will of the majority. The will of the majority is to be recognized even when irregularly expressed.

I ask the House to bear in mind the distinction which I make. I make the distinction that as to the act and the evidence of the act there is an essential difference. What are the returns? What are these rules and regulations? They are simply to obtain the evidence of the act of the voter. I do not care how irregularly it may be expressed, if there is evidence aliunde showing what the acts of the voters were, that evidence is as good and as binding upon this House as if all the provisions of the law had been complied with.

Now, will this House accept and adopt a principle that will place in the hands of designing men who have control and management of elections the power to do some act whereby they may defeat the will of a majority of the people and allow this House to elect its own members? If you adopt the principle contended for by the majority, you certainly open the door to fraud, and you place it in the hands of any majority in this House to so use the officers of election as to place in this House men not elected by the people, but elected by the House itself, and, as I have said, thereby defeat the will of the people.

Dameron testifies what the actual vote was at that precinct. We are not obliged to go to the returns, although the returns stand here unimpeached.

But my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] urges another objection. He says that they called in by-standers. One word in regard to that matter. The law of Louisiana requires that the commissioners of election shall make out the returns and swear to them. What is that oath? I will read it to the House:

> STATE OF LOUISIANA, Parish of Concordia:
> Personally appeared before me, the undersigned authority, John F. Dameron, R. H. Columbus, and T. E. D. Jefferson, duly appointed and qualified commissioners of election of poll No. 5, election precinct of the parish of Concordia, for the general election held November 2, 1874, who, being duly sworn, depose and say that they received the ballots cast at the said poll on the day above mentioned; that they have made a true and lawful count of said ballots, and that the foregoing is a true and correct statement of the votes cast at said poll on said day.
> Sworn and subscribed to before me this 4th day of November, A. D. 1874.
> JNO. A. WASHINGTON,
> Supervisor of Registration.
> JNO. F. DAMERON,
> THOS. E. D. JEFFERSON,
> R. H. COLUMBUS,
> Commissioners of Election, Poll No. 5, Parish of ——.

This man Dameron, with the other commissioners, as it will be seen, took and subscribed to that oath. The return is here subscribed to by them that the vote was fairly and honestly counted, and that the return contains the vote as actually deposited in the box by the voters themselves. Nowhere are the returns impeached in this evidence. I defy the majority of the committee to show a single act, except the act of removing the box from the voting-place to the county seat, that even raises the presumption of irregularity or non-compliance with the law. This return is in the evidence sworn and subscribed by these three commissioners, on page 25.

Let us see whether the evidence supports my assertion. The evidence of Mr. Jefferson, one of the commissioners, is as follows:

> I made no objection to opening and counting the votes at the polls, but stated I had served as commissioner of election before and always took the boxes to Vidalia to count them; and we had no instruction book to guide us, and I did not know what else to do, believing that to be the law. I had left the instruction book at home, having forgotten to take it with me. The election on that day was free and fair.

Mr. Dameron says on this subject:

> When the polls closed, the other two commissioners refused to open and count the votes at the polls, they saying that the box ought to be taken to Vidalia and the votes counted there. Not having the book of instructions for holding the elections, I acquiesced in their wishes.

What was the law previous to this election? The law was that the ballot-box should be removed to the county seat and the vote there counted. These commissioners thought they were complying with the law when they started on their mission to Vidalia, not knowing that this law had been changed by the Legislature.

But a majority of the committee say, if I forsooth happen to be in this House, and a man is murdered, there is a presumption I did it because I could have done it if I desired! That is the position they take. They say the inference is that the commissioners failed to discharge their duty. I claim the law is well settled that officers are supposed to perform their duty honestly and faithfully until the contrary is made to appear. The committee say no; that it is to be presumed the officers committed a fraud, without any evidence but the mere fact that because the commissioners could have done so if they wished, and that that raises the presumption that they actually did commit fraud. It is a monstrous doctrine, and if adopted by the House I tell gentlemen the time may come in the near future when a simple majority in the House at a time when the presidential election is about to occur, believing or suspecting the election may be thrown into the House and desiring to have the control of the country, may, upon a frivolous pretext, encourage and invite men to make contests, and being governed by the precedents you are now asked to establish, go on unseating members until they have possession of the entire House, and by that process defeat the will and wishes of the people and usurp a power that does not belong to them. I say there is danger in going out of the well-marked paths which have been established by our predecessors, and when I make that remark I make it after having examined every case which has been decided in this House, as seen by the printed reports which are of easy reference, and I defy any member to produce a single instance where this House ever held that a precinct or poll is to be rejected for mere informality in the absence of fraud, if the actual truth can be ascertained.

I quote again from McCrary in his Election Law:

It is mainly with reference to these two results that the rules for conducting elections are prescribed by legislative power. To hold that these rules are mandatory is to subordinate the substance to the form, the end to the means. (Page 200.)

Further on the same author says:

Bear in mind that irregularities are generally to be disregarded.

Does the majority complained of affect or change the result? Is it so claimed by Spencer in his notice of contest? And has he offered any evidence to show that he was defrauded of a single vote? Does he offer any evidence that he would have received a greater vote than he actually received by the returns if the box had not been removed?

No, sir; he does not claim this in his notice. Not one word of evidence does he offer upon the subject, but he stands alone upon the mere technicality that a directory provision of the law was violated by the commissioners, and that upon this the House should allow him 560 votes that he did not receive, and give him a seat to which he nowhere contends he was elected, except on account of irregularities in the conduct of the officers holding the election.

Now, in the case of David Bard, (Hall and Clark, page 116,) the committee held—

That even where the law required that the returns should be made on the 15th day of November, and the commissioners of election did not make the return until the 1st of May, then this irregularity would not defeat the election.

Although the returns were not made until six months after the law required them to be made, the House held—and that was under the good old democratic rule—that it would not defeat the election of the returned member.

In the case of Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, (Hall and Clark, page 506,) the committee say:

When the people, in the exercise of their constitutional rights, have gone through the process of an election according to the prescribed rules of law, they ought not to be deprived of the advantage accruing therefrom but for the most substantial reasons. Indeed, nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom the majority of votes have been cast ought to vacate the election.

How do you apply that doctrine here? You have got the actual vote, by evidence aliunde, by returns of the returning board; and yet the House is asked by the majority of the committee to reject the returns, to reject the evidence of the witnesses, and to seat a man who nowhere claims that he received any more votes than are actually returned for him by the returning board, nowhere attempts to dispute the evidence of the witnesses as to the number of votes cast; but upon the frivolous pretext and technicality that the commissioners of election removed the boxes before counting the vote, the boxes containing the ballot being in the custody of his own partisan friends, and by this rejection award him a seat which the evidence shows he was not entitled to.

Another rule to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and which I invoke in this case. It is stated by McCrary, section 305:

If the voice of the electors can be made to appear from the returns with reasonable clearness and certainty, then the election shall stand.

Have you not before you the evidence of the commissioners themselves testifying what the actual vote was? You have. Have you not the returns? You have. Is the evidence of the commissioners contradicted? It is not. Are they anywhere impeached? They are not. Then will this House, upon the mere technicality of a violation of a provision of law, which the supreme court of Louisiana says is simply directory and not mandatory—will you upon that ground give the vote of the fifth precinct to Mr. Spencer by rejecting the entire poll, when the actual vote is determined and the will of the electors made to appear, both by the evidence and the returns, positively and with certainty? If this vote is counted, as the majority of the committee contend it must be, it will leave Spencer, exclusive of Carroll Parish, a majority of 992.

I now pass to the consideration of Carroll Parish. That there were gross irregularities there no one will deny; but who was it that committed them? I do not charge it upon Mr. Spencer. I do not claim that his friends had anything to do with it. But that there were corrupt men connected with the clerk's office as officers no one can deny. Yes, the boxes were stolen; the returns were stolen; and we have to go now on the very best data we can gather. But it is claimed that it was Mr. Morey's partisan friends. They certainly did not act like partisan friends of Mr. Morey. But whether money or other means were used to corrupt this county clerk, the depositary of the returns of election, we are left simply to conjecture; there is no evidence upon this point.

Now, sir, there were some of the directory provisions of the law violated in Carroll Parish, and my remarks in reference to Concordia Parish on that point apply equally to Carroll Parish. I will first consider poll No. 1. What are the facts in connection with this poll? First, we find that when the evidence was being taken in this case, on an examination in the clerk's office no returns were found; the ballots had been taken away or destroyed. The election law of Louisiana requires that the ballot-boxes containing the ballots shall be placed in the custody of the county clerk with the return and kept by him until the first term of the district court of the parish. Were the ballots and returns so deposited and kept? The only witness that testifies on this subject is one Galbraith. Galbraith says that no returns were ever deposited in the county clerk's office. He says that he was deputy clerk and had full control and custody of the office, and he knows no returns were deposited. Well, now, let us see how that was. This Galbraith seems to be an interesting man; he is certainly a remarkable man. He testified that there were no returns on file in the clerk's office from any poll in the parish, and right in the very face of that statement here stands out in bold relief a copy of the return for poll 1 of Carroll Parish, certified to by this identical Galbraith as a correct copy of the original return on file in the clerk's office.

Further on Mr. Jackson and the other commissioners of election, democrats and republicans, all testify that they deposited the returns and the ballots in accordance with law in the clerk's office of the parish, thus directly and positively contradicting this man Galbraith. I will not stop to find this evidence; if gentlemen will examine the record they will find this testimony given precisely as I have stated it. Galbraith's statement is contradicted by every one of the commissioners, Jackson, Spann, and Rhodes. They testified that they deposited the return—where? In the clerk's office. The return is produced, and the certificate of Galbraith is upon that return. He is thus contradicted by his own signature and by the three commissioners, democrats and republicans.

"O, they have been spirited away," my associate upon the committee exclaimed. Spirited away! By whom? No one knows; but it strikes me that it must have been done by some one interested. It is true that when contestee called for the return, this deputy-clerk Galbraith swears, they are not on file, and never were deposited. Certainly it was not to the advantage of Morey to have these returns and ballots "spirited away;" for the evidence proves that he received nearly all the votes cast at this poll. He certainly could not be interested in destroying the evidence of his own election.

Who was the loser? Who was the man who suffered by the loss of these returns? It was Morey. There is not a scintilla of evidence to be found in the record and none is offered by Spencer to contradict the testimony of the commissioners of election at this poll as to the fact that Morey received nearly every vote which was cast, and it stands as a fact admitted that Morey received a large majority at this poll. Who was interested in "spiriting away the ballot-box" in that precinct? Certainly not Mr. Morey. I do not charge Mr. Spencer or any of his friends with being concerned in doing that, but, to be frank to the House, I will state that certain parties desirous of being elected to the senate and house of representatives of the State were engaged in a conspiracy to defeat the will of the people, and, in pursuance of this conspiracy to advance themselves and their own individual interests, they canceled or destroyed the returns and ballots, and in doing this they prevented Mr. Morey from establishing by the returns and by the ballots themselves the evidence of his election. One word in regard to the fifth poll of Concordia, which I omitted while upon that subject.

I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] who laid great stress on the calling of tally-keepers from among outsiders, that this is not a violation of any law governing elections in the State of Louisiana. I will cite all the evidence in the record upon this subject. Mr. Dameron testifies (and he is the only witness) as follows:

I was not considered to be a republican. The labor of counting the votes was very considerable, as it was a general election and quite a number of candidates voted for. I only heard two candidates make objection to our mode and manner of counting. No objection by anybody else was made to me. The votes cast at this fifth-ward box were counted and returned by the supervisor, as between all the candidates at said election. I don't think the tally-lists were very regularly kept, as we had no regular tally-keepers, and had to pick them up as we could get them. I believe the tally-lists were kept as correctly as they could have been kept under the circumstances.

There is no provision of law requiring a man who keeps the tally-list to be an officer of the election absolutely, for the commissioners have the power to authorize outsiders to act as tally-keepers. It is not unusual for commissioners at all elections to call in outsiders to assist in keeping the tally, and the decision of the House is that this alone is not sufficient cause to reject the poll; and, in fact, the House has gone so far as to decide that where the commissioners themselves have not been sworn, it is not a sufficient cause of itself to vitiate the election.

Returning again to Carroll Parish poll, one objection was urged by my colleague on the committee, that Anderson, one of the commissioners, handed greenbacks out to the voters with their registration papers to control votes. Now one man, and but one, a colored man, says that he saw greenbacks passed out of the window; twenty-five witnesses, democrats and republicans, candidates, commissioners, supervisors, democratic and republican, were interrogated on that subject but not one of them had witnessed anything of the kind, and there is not a lawyer in the House who if he will examine the testimony of this one man would give it weight of any sort, for it shows on its face that it was a story manufactured for the purpose, and it is detailed in such a manner as to stamp it as false. After the time had expired for Mr. Spencer to take his evidence in chief, and after contestant called this witness, contestee had concluded his testimony; thus affording contestee no opportunity to refute the Munchausen statement made by this witness. This interesting testimony of Cæsar Johnson I will read to the House from page 66:

CÆSAR JOHNSON, sworn for contestant, testifies as follows:

Question. State your name, residence, and occupation, and where you were on the 2d of November last, the day of the general election.

Answer. My name is Cæsar Johnson; I live in Carroll Parish; am a farmer, leasing land from Mr. Tilford; was at poll No. 1.

Q. State where and how the voters voted at said poll while you were there, and how it was managed.

A. I voted at the window, and all others who voted with me at same time did the same. I voted by the assistance of Noah Lane, who caught me under my arm and assisted me up so I could reach the window. I don't think a man standing on the ground near the window could see the ballot-box. I could not, I know.

Q. Did you or not see money passed out of the window to the voters with their registration papers; and, if so, who did it?

A. I saw money passed out with registration papers by David Jackson; I saw him do it several times.

Q. Did anybody speak to you about it at the time it was being done, and what did he say?

A. Yes, sir; Noah Lane spoke to me about it at the time and said: "O, Johnson, look at the greenbacks; let's turn." I said, "O no," He said: "Why?" and I said, "Maybe they are running an independent ticket." I voted the Gla republican ticket on white paper.

Cross-examined by contestee:

Q. Did you hear one man cry out, "O, Jackson, greenbacks;" and who was that man?

A. I did hear a man so cry out, but do not know the man.

Q. What kind of a looking man was he?

A. He was a black man; but I did not notice his features.

Q. Was he a tall man?

A. He was about the common height.

Q. Was he an old man?

A. No, sir.

Q. Did you notice particularly his age?

A. He looked quite young to me.

Q. Was he a fat man?

A. No, sir; he didn't look very fat.

Q. Was he a well-dressed man?

A. He looked to me to be poorly dressed.

Q. How far were you from him when he cried out, "O, Jackson greenbacks?"

A. About ten feet.

Q. Did he cry it out more than once?

A. No, sir.

Q. Can you read?

A. A little; coarse reading.

Q. Or write?

A. I can scratch a little.

Q. Are you a short man?

A. I am about 5 feet 2½ inches.

Q. When Lane helped you to put up your ballot, did he lift you off the ground, or did he stretch you up by assisting you by one arm?

A. He assisted me by lifting one arm, I at the same time helping myself up against the side of the house.

Q. Was there a pretty large crowd present when you got to the polls?

A. Yes, sir; a pretty large crowd.

Q. Did they all vote before you came away?

A. No, sir; I left them voting.

Q. How many do you think voted while you were there?

A. There was a pretty large crowd, but I cannot tell how many voted while I was there.

CÆSAR JOHNSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 7th day of May, 1875.

S. DUNCAN GLENN,
Notary Public.

Here is Cæsar Johnson's testimony, and he was the only witness out of twenty-three called from that poll, and every one of the others testified that they never observed anything of the kind.

Now, that is the only evidence of this greenback business, and I now come to the testimony as to the box being removed to the window. My associates on the committee on the other side of the House laid great stress upon the fact that at this precinct they voted at a window some six feet from the ground. Now, what was the fact? The fact is that the election was held at an old log cabin, and that when the voting commenced the box was placed at the door of the cabin, where there were strips nailed across the door. The crowd was so great about the doors that they broke down the barriers, and when the barriers failed to keep the voting-place clear they removed the box from the door and put it at a window, and the testimony shows that there was not a single witness who was debarred from voting on account of this removal of the ballot-box; but further, it is observed that the window was five or six feet from the ground, and that some of the voters voted by placing their ballots on sticks and handing them up. Well, some of the voters who were in line did place their ballots on sticks, undoubtedly in order to vote without waiting to reach the window in their turn, and they were received. There was a democratic commissioner present, and nobody urged a single objection, and no objection was made to that proceeding until long after the election, when this thing was seized on as the means of unseating a man who had been legally elected.

A case was made up by the sheriff of the county in regard to this identical election, contesting it upon the same grounds and evidence adduced in this case. It was carried to the supreme court of the State, and let me read you what the supreme court said on the subject:

Mr. DE BOLT. Is all that in the evidence?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Yes, sir; but I supposed I could quote the decision of the supreme court if it were not.

Let me read to you the decision of the supreme court of Louisiana upon this identical election and upon this identical poll as presented in the case of Burton vs. Hicks:

It has been often decided that the failure to comply with the directory clauses of an election law will not annul an election. Courts cannot affix to the omission a consequence which the Legislature has not affixed. (9 Annual, page 557; 10 Annual, page 732; Act of 1873, page 18.)

There is an essential difference between the act of voting and the police provisions to secure the evidence of the act. If the votes be deposited the object of the election is attained, and its validity cannot be affected by the non-observance of the directory provisions. (13 Annual, 301.) The act of 1873, No. 98, provides for the punishment of those who violate its provisions, and the criminal courts of the State have cognizance of such matters. The law does not authorize the election to be set aside, except for fraud, intimidation, violence, or corruption at or before the election, and then only when such fraud, violence, intimidation, &c., had the effect to change the result of the election.

"Errors of judgment are inevitable, but fraud, intimidation, and violence the law can and should protect against." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 621.) The same author says: "When an election is thus rendered irregular, whether the irregularity shall avoid it or not must depend generally upon the effect the irregularity may have had in obstructing the complete expression of the popular will, or the production of satisfactory evidence thereof. Election statutes are to be tested like other statutes, but with a leaning to liberality, in view of the great public purposes which they accomplish, and, except where they specifically provide that a thing shall be done in the manner indicated, and not otherwise, their provisions, designed merely for the information and guidance of the officers, must be regarded as directory only, and the election will not be defeated by a failure to comply with them, provided the irregularity has not hindered any who were entitled from exercising the right of suffrage, or rendered doubtful the evidences from which the result was to be declared," (618;) and it was said in People vs. Cook, 14 Barbour, 257, and 8 New York, 67, "that any irregularity in conducting an election which does not deprive a legal voter of his vote, or admit a disqualified voter to vote, or cast uncertainty on the result, and has not been occasioned by the agency of a party seeking to derive a benefit from it, should be overlooked in a proceeding to try the right to an office depending on such election. This rule is an eminently proper one, and it furnishes a very satisfactory test as to what is essential and what is not in election laws. And when a party contests an election on the ground of these or any similar irregularities, he ought to aver and be able to show that the result was affected by them." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 619; 13 Annual, 175.)

Nowhere has the contestant introduced a single word of evidence tending to show that a single voter was deprived of his right to vote on account of the ballot-box being removed from the door to the window. On the contrary, every witness called both by the contestant and the contestee says that it was a free, fair, and full election. I defy the majority of the committee to find one word of evidence in the whole record contradicting the assertions I make, that every witness produced by the contestant and contestee testified to the fact that the election was full, fair, and free, and that no man was deprived of his vote on account of the ballot-box being removed from the door to the window.

But there is one other objection urged against this poll, that there are no returns. My friend makes a mistake, if I understand him rightly, when he says that there were no returns. The fact is that there is a return and it is proven by the commissioner. A man who was a commissioner at poll No. 2 was called and questioned as to the return of poll No. 1. He said that he had that return, and when asked to produce it he produced it, and it is now here in evidence. What more? He was asked where he got that return, and he said that he obtained it from the county clerk's office, and there is the signature of the deputy county clerk (Galbraith) to it, as I stated once before, showing that the return had been deposited in that office.

But, say the majority of the committee, this return cannot be received because it does not come from the clerk himself. The contestee called upon the commissioners, and they, democrat, republican, and liberal, swore that it was a correct return, that it was the original return, and that it had their signatures to it, and that it contained a correct statement of the votes cast at this poll. Now I ask you in the name of common justice if this House is willing, because a thief breaks into a clerk's office and steals a return, and it is afterward recovered, identified, and sworn to by the men who made it, is this House willing to reject that return and seat a man upon such technical grounds?

These are facts proven by the record. I hold here in my hand the return as sworn to by the democratic and republican commissioners. They swear that they made out the return and that it is correct. That return gives Mr. Morey 569 votes and Mr. Spencer 33 votes. We have here the identical, original return made by the commissioners, and although it was stolen from the clerk's office, it was afterward recovered and identified, and it becomes evidence until impeached. Now is there any evidence impeaching that return? Not one word. Nor is there a particle of evidence showing that there were more votes returned than were cast at that poll and counted. On the other hand, there are witnesses called by the contestant and contestee who swear that these votes were accurately returned. One man swears that he kept a memorandum of the votes cast, and it compares exactly with the return. He was a democrat, and certainly his evidence ought to be good with the other side of the House. He is asked if he observed the counting of the votes and if he could tell how many votes were received. He says that to the best of his memory and belief there were so many votes received, and he gives the identical number contained in the return.

I will not detain the House longer upon this part of the case. I believe I have referred to all the grounds that are alleged and urged by the majority of the committee as a cause why this poll should be rejected. The first is that there are no returns from this poll. The evidence shows that there was a return, and the return is here. Second, it is urged that the box was removed from the door to the window. The supreme court of the State says that as long as the result was not affected that will not vitiate the election.

It is said that Jackson handed out greenbacks from the window. There is but one witness out of twenty-three or twenty-four who says anything of the kind; and this man did not see it himself, but he heard some one say, "O, Jackson, there are greenbacks." Right upon that point let me add to what I have already stated, that the democratic supervisor testified that the registration papers were handed in with the votes; that Mr. Jackson received the registration papers and marked them "voted," and passed them to the democratic supervisor, who returned them to the voters.

If greenbacks were handed out at all, the democratic supervisor of election must have handed them out; for he swears that he handed out the registration papers, while Jackson, whom my associate accuses of handing out the greenbacks, only received the registration papers and marked them "voted." That is the evidence. Here is what T. B. Rhodes, a liberal republican supervisor of election, says:

Question. Do you know a colored voter named Cæsar Johnson, and did you hear that he reported that "greenbacks" were handed out at the window at poll No. 1? And, if so, state what you know of him and of the story, and of the facts in the case.

Answer. I know him and heard him give his evidence to the effect stated before the district court. I know nothing of him personally, but I do know that his statement that David Jackson, one of the commissioners, rolled up greenbacks in the registration papers and handed them back to the voters is untrue.

This is the testimony of the liberal-republican supervisor, who was at the box watching the whole transaction. He testifies that the story of Cæsar Johnson in reference to this matter is wholly untrue—because the tickets or ballots, together with the registration-papers, were handed up to David Jackson, who took the ballot and handed the registration-papers to me, which I indorsed "voted." Jackson then put the ballot in the box, and I handed the registration-paper to Mr. Mayer, who was acting as democratic United States supervisor, and who handed it out to the voter. I never heard this report from any other source, and I don't believe it was possible to be true without my having some knowledge of it.

This evidence disposes of that greenback story of which so much is made.

By an examination of the report in regard to poll No. 1 it will be found that the poll-list at that precinct also is in evidence, giving the name and number of every man who voted at that poll, certified and sworn to.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. BROWN,] will be entitled to an hour, and is willing to yield me half of it. If the House will consent, I would like to finish now what I have to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS.) Is there objection to the gentleman from Mississippi occupying now one-half of the time to which the gentleman from Kansas will be entitled?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, before passing from poll No. 1 to poll No. 2, I wish to say that I claim and the minority of the committee claim that poll No. 1 should be counted. This poll gives Mr. Morey a majority of 536, which, deducted from 992, the majority with which Spencer left the fifth poll of Concordia, leaves Spencer's majority 456.

I now proceed to consider the second poll of Concordia Parish; and here we are met with the same difficulty that we encountered at the last poll, namely, that the ballot-boxes have been stolen from the clerk's office; the returns have been stolen; no returns can possibly be found. Only one official paper is found, and that is fully identified by the commissioners or by the men who made the poll-list. The law requires that as the voters vote their names shall be recorded, and numbers set opposite their names consecutively. We have then as exhibit 6, on page 30 of the minority report, the poll-list of Carroll Parish, which shows that at that poll 713 voters voted. Mr. Spencer nowhere claims that a single man who is named in this list as voting was an illegal voter or that a single illegal vote was received. But it is admitted that this poll-list shows that these individuals named as voters at that precinct had a right to vote. It is nowhere claimed that they did not vote; and the evidence of the contestant, Spencer, shows that there were about that number of votes cast.

We are now left to the very best evidence that can be obtained of what was the vote actually polled at this precinct. We are therefore obliged to take the circumstances occurring at the polls and the memory of the commissioner who made up the return of the poll (we claim that this evidence, if uncontradicted, is the next best evidence obtainable) and from these sources ascertain, if possible, what the actual vote was and for whom it was cast. I claim here that it is a well-established principle of law that this House will use every effort to ascertain the exact will of the electors before it will declare a seat vacant or award it to another party. This House, then, will, if possible, go behind the returns, and by any proper evidence which may be presented ascertain what that vote was. Does the contestee produce such evidence? He does undoubtedly. Let me call attention to the evidence in order that I may not misquote it. I wish first, however, to state that the contestant's witnesses and those of the contestee all agree that the election at this poll, as at the others, was perfectly fair, free, and full. The commissioners swear that they made up their returns and sent them to the place where they should have been deposited. They testify what was the vote actually cast at that precinct. They furthermore produce the poll-list and certify to it.

I wish to repeat and press upon the House that the contestant nowhere claims that a single illegal vote was cast at this poll or that he received a single vote more than the commissioners testify to. He does not contradict the commissioners; and I say that when the returns themselves are lost we must resort to the next best evidence. What is the next best evidence? If the individuals who make a paper are not competent witnesses to state the contents of that paper, then I would like to know in reason and common sense how we would be able under the rules of law to prove the contents of a written document which has been lost.

The commissioners who make the returns are brought upon the stand and testify to what? To what the contents of the returns were. The contestant has proved that the papers are destroyed, are not in existence, and cannot be found. I do not understand it to be necessary to cite a single authority to support the proposition that when a paper is lost secondary evidence is admissible to establish its contents.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Destroyed by whom?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. By some party unknown; there is no evidence to show by whom. The contestant proves by the clerk that they are destroyed, and that he never saw them and cannot find them.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Not destroyed by Morey and his friends, because they give him a thousand majority.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. It gave him a thousand majority. It is admitted by Spencer there is a large majority for Morey at that poll, and he therefore cannot be charged with the responsibility of destroying the returns that would give him a clear majority. Remember this man who is testifying is a democratic supervisor, and he states that he made the returns in accordance with the statute to the officers at New Orleans.

W. B. Dickey, witness for contestee, swears, page 54, record:

Question. How long were you at that poll on that day and immediately afterward?

Answer. Was there all day until the poll closed. At the closing of the poll I retired, and returned to the poll between twelve and one o'clock that night, when they were still engaged in counting the votes, where I remained until the counting was completed. When I came in between twelve and one o'clock at night, I took the place of Thomas F. Montgomery, democratic commissioner at that poll, in keeping one of the tally-sheets, and remained until the count was finished.

Q. Did you or not learn the result of the vote cast at that poll when the count was completed? And, if so, state what it was, if you recollect.

(Contestant objects to this question.)

A. I think the entire number of votes cast at said poll was 719. The vote for senator was 282 for Gla and 427 for Benham. There were 49 for Spencer for member of Congress and for Morey 664 or 5 for Congress. I do not recollect the vote cast for State treasurer, but that Moncure got about the same vote as Spencer did, and Dubuclet about the same vote as Morey did.

Q. Did you take any memoranda of any part of the result of the election at poll No. 2; and, if so, does the statement that you have made with regard to the vote for member of Congress agree with the memorandum that you took at the closing of the count?

(This question objected to by contestant.)

A. I did take a memorandum of the votes so far as the candidates for senator, members of Congress, and house of representatives, and the memoranda, so far as Congress is concerned, agreed with my testimony on that point. I have lost all my memoranda except that of senator, or misplaced them.

And on cross-examination by contestant, he swears:

Q. You state that you were not present during all the time that the votes were being counted and tallied. Do you know of your own knowledge the truth of the statement of the votes given by you?

A. I only know that the three tally-sheets kept agreed at the end of the counting. I do not know of my own knowledge that these tally-sheets were correctly kept during the whole time of counting, as I was not present all the while. I know that mine was correctly kept from the time that I commenced keeping it.

Q. Are you positive about the congressional vote, and have you never stated it differently?

A. I am positive about the congressional vote, and do not recollect of ever having stated it differently.

B. H. Lanier, witness for contestee, swears, (pages 48 and 49:)

I remained at the polls until after the votes were counted, and assisted in keeping the tally-sheet.

Question. State, if you know, what the total vote was that was cast at that poll; and state the vote that was cast for the candidates for Congress, if you know.

(Contestant objects to this question, as heretofore.)

Answer. According to the best of my recollection, the entire vote for congressional candidates was something over 700. I think Spencer received 48, 49, or 50 votes, and Morey the balance of the total vote.

Q. Were or not several tallies kept by different parties present; and, if so, were or not they kept under the direction or supervision of commissioners at the poll?

A. There were three tally-sheets kept under the direct supervision of the commissioners at poll No. 2. One of these tallies I assisted in keeping. Those who kept each tally relieved each other from time to time in the labor.

Cross-examined:

Q. Did you keep a tally during the whole time and continuously while that vote was being counted?

A. I did not. I think it took about twenty-four hours to count the vote, and it would have been impossible almost for a man to have tallied continuously for that time.

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge what the vote and result at that poll was?

A. In my direct examination I gave the result of that vote to the best of my knowledge and belief.

W. A. Blacut, called by contestant, (pages 60, 61,) swears:

Question. Did you or not see the tally-sheet and other papers of poll No. 2, when the counting and tallying at that poll was completed?

Answer. I saw the list of voters who had voted and the tally-sheets about eight o'clock Tuesday night, after the votes in the box had been called. The tally-sheets were not then cast up and carried out, nor signed by the commissioners; but Mr. Dickey figured up for his use and mine the number of votes that were cast for two of the candidates, to wit, Gla and Benham, candidates for State senate.

Q. Please state what that vote was.

(Objected to by contestant.)

A. The vote was—Gla, 282; Benham, 427.

Q. Did you or not at that time ask for or take a memorandum of the vote for Spencer for Congress at that poll? And, if so, state what it was.

(Contestant objects to this as heretofore, as incompetent evidence.)

A. I did take a memorandum, and it was 65 votes.

Q. Have you ever made any statement of the election in Carroll Parish to the chief supervisor for this State of this judicial circuit at New Orleans?

A. I sent a statement to A. J. Aiken, at New Orleans, to be delivered to the democratic central committee, giving a statement such as I got from deputies I appointed at different polls, but who were not appointed by Judge Woods, and whom I appointed, supposing I had the right to do it. I knew nothing about the correctness of the statements I got from the deputies.

I could read from five or six other witnesses, commissioners, officers who kept the tally, men about the polls, confirming this proof of Blount and Lanier and Dickey; but I have read enough to show to the House that the point made by the minority is made good. We have proved by the commissioners the contents of the returns; that, it having been shown the returns were lost, we have proved their contents by the officer who made them, and therefore this House is obliged to receive them.

It is stated there is a discrepancy in the evidence; that some say there was a larger vote cast for Morey and others a less vote. Now, it is but equitable and just we should take the least number testified to. The minority have taken the least number any witness produced by the contestant or the contestee testified as the number of votes received at the ballot-box for Morey and have given Spencer the largest number testified as received for him. What is the result? Taking the lowest number for Morey and giving Spencer the highest number, which is 65, sworn to by W. A. Blount, the United States supervisor at that poll, who says that he took a memorandum of the vote for Spencer at that poll, and that the vote was 65, and adding the 4 blank votes to the 65 votes conceded to Spencer, we have 69 votes to be deducted from 713, which leaves the number sworn to and admitted by contestant's evidence, namely, 644, the lowest number which can possibly, from the evidence, be counted for Morey. The contestant does not attempt to prove that these votes, 644, were not cast for Morey.

Now, I will pass to poll No. 3. What do we rest upon in regard to poll No. 3? The returns are lost; the returns were stolen, and we have to look somewhere else for evidence. The returning board has nothing to do with this case. The commissioners of this poll made affidavits and sent them before the returning board. Mr. Bagley, the democratic commissioner at this poll, for the purpose of showing that Gla and Benham were improperly returned, made his solemn affidavit—this democratic commissioner, I say, made an affidavit and filed it before the board giving the actual vote. Now, are you going to refuse the evidence of your own partisan friend? Are you going to discredit a man who stands unimpeached for integrity, whose partisan feelings would not allow him to do anything in favor of the contestee, and whose honor would not allow him to do anything dishonorable against the contestant? He, before this congressional question arose, made a solemn affidavit almost the next day after the returns were filed in the office of the returning board at New Orleans giving the actual vote cast for Spencer and Morey. Will you reject this evidence and say the man who is proved to have received the minority vote is to be seated on the floor of the House and the majority candidate is to be expelled? What is Bagley's testimony? It shows that Mr. Bagley, the democratic commissioner, a short time after the election and before the returning board of the State had declared the result, filed his affidavit in which he states that Morey received 510 votes and Spencer 7 votes.

Thus the democratic commissioners, before the returning board had declared the result, stated upon oath that Morey received 510 votes and Spencer 7 votes. And yet this House is asked to seat the contestant with this evidence staring it in the face, and when the contestant in his notice never claims that he was elected except on the ground that because of certain irregularities Morey's vote should be excluded and he should be counted in. It will be a strange precedent if a minority candidate, acknowledged to be so by himself, is to be seated and a majority candidate, shown to be such by the testimony of the democratic commissioners themselves, is to be unseated by the House with the evidence before them, positive, uncontradicted, and establishing every fact alleged in the minority's report.

And, what is most singular, Mr. Arroyo, the gentleman who protested before the returning board at New Orleans in the protest which he issued at that time, denounces the returning board and proclaims in that document that Mr. Morey received 510 votes and Mr. Spencer 7, and shows that the return was changed in reference to the senatorial vote and as to no other. Certainly contestant is not justified in asking that this poll should be thrown out, when it is admitted by his own partisan friends upon the returning board, after a full investigation of the case, that he, Spencer, received but 7 votes and Morey 510 votes. Contestant has introduced no evidence to contradict Bagley's or Anderson's statements. Anderson testifies to the same thing. He testifies that he was one of the commissioners. Here are two who testify as to the vote cast. And yet the House is asked to disregard these affidavits, notwithstanding that there is not one word of evidence to impeach their statements nor to disprove the announcement made by Mr. Arroyo, his partisan friend on the returning board. There is no evidence to show whether the box at this poll was deposited in the clerk's office or not; and applying the rule that an officer is presumed to have discharged his duty in the absence of proof to the contrary, it follows that the box was so deposited. We are therefore satisfied that this poll should be counted. The total number of votes cast at this poll for member of Congress was 517. Taking the said vote cast for Spencer, 7, from those cast for Morey, 510, we have a majority for Morey of 503 at this poll, which added to Morey's majority of 123, with which he left poll 2, gives Morey a majority of 626.

Now here is something singular; and I wish the House to listen to the statement. The entire committee agree to count poll No. 4; and the evidence in regard to poll No. 4 is identical with the evidence as to poll No. 3. They reject polls Nos. 1, 2, and 3, and then they agree to count polls Nos. 4 and 5. And I defy the majority of the committee to show a particle of evidence in reference to polls Nos. 4 or 5 of a different character from that bearing upon polls Nos. 1, 2, and 3. It cannot be found. I cannot be contradicted in that assertion.

Well, sir, by counting polls Nos. 4 and 5 Carroll Parish, and excluding poll No. 5 Concordia, and polls Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of Carroll, it will have the same result as it would if polls Nos. 4 and 5 were excluded. That is the conclusion they arrive at. But the committee actually count polls Nos. 4 and 5; and the evidence in regard to polls Nos. 4 and 5 is identical with the evidence in regard to polls Nos. 1, 2, and 3. If, however, the committee had agreed to count poll No. 5 Concordia, and Nos. 1, 2, and 3 Carroll, and excluded polls Nos. 4 and 5 Carroll, that would have elected Morey.

Therefore there is no dispute as to poll No. 4. What is the vote then that is agreed upon for poll No. 4? The only evidence in regard to poll No. 4 is that of McCandless, who was a United States supervisor of elections at this poll. He makes an affidavit as to what the vote was in the return, and the whole committee say that should be counted. And yet Anderson, one of the commissioners of poll No. 3, and Bagley, the democratic commissioner of poll No. 3, both testify as to the number of votes cast, and the committee say it should be rejected. That is logic and consistency for you.

Now, what is the vote agreed upon in regard to poll No. 4? Morey received 155, Spencer 75. The committee agree they shall be counted, and it is placed upon the simple affidavit of McCandless, who is the supervisor, not the commissioner; and supervisors testified in regard to the other polls. We have the poll-list and we have the returns, and yet they reject them. At that poll there were 155 votes for Morey and 75 votes for Spencer. Taking this count, we have this result: The committee agree that this poll should be counted, which gives Spencer 75 votes and Morey 155 votes. Taking Spencer's vote, 75, from Morey's 155, we have 80 majority for Morey, which, added to 626 which he had when he left poll 3, gives Morey 706; and there is not one word of evidence from the beginning of the record to the close to contradict this. Nor does the contestant in his notice claim that that is not the case; but he tacitly admits that the contestee did receive the majority of the votes. He claims that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the result; in other words, he claims that the electors actually gave a majority of 700 votes for Morey, but on account of the negligence and misconduct of the officers, for which Morey is not responsible, therefore the will of the electors is to be defeated, notwithstanding the fact that contestant admits himself to be the minority candidate.

Now we come to poll 5. As regards poll 5 it is exactly in the same condition as the other four polls, but the committee agree that it shall be counted. What are the facts in regard to this poll? They are simply this: That Spencer received a majority in that poll, and the result is as follows: Spencer received 108 votes, Frank Morey received 96. Now, what is the recapitulation? The recapitulation that the minority arrive at is just this: The majorities admitted as having been received by Spencer amount to 3,956. The majority of Morey according to the statement of the case by the minority of the committee, which I have gone over as briefly as possible, is 4,650. Taking the total number of Spencer's majority, 3,956, from Morey's total majority, 4,650, we have left as Morey's majority at that election 694.

Now, I have endeavored to state the facts as they appear from the evidence; and in conclusion I wish to say to this House that if the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the claims of the contestee before the committee, this House can do no less, in view of all the facts and evidence, than to remand the case back to the committee, with the direction that the evidence of the voters shall be taken to show what number of votes were cast.

The only claim that is made here, the only claim that the committee have seen fit to put forth, is that the evidence is not of a character sufficient to sustain the vote; in other words, instead of calling the commissioners who held the election to testify to what the contents of their returns were and what was the actual vote cast at that election, that Mr. Morey should have called every individual voter and proved by every individual man for whom he voted. The contestant, as I have repeatedly stated in the course of my remarks, nowhere claims that he received a majority, and nowhere denies that Morey received a majority. But he claims because of these irregularities and because he has not called the voters, therefore the election is to be set aside so far as Morey is concerned, and he, Spencer, is to be seated. I warn this House that after having examined this evidence and the facts in this case, if they adopt a precedent of this character they are on the high road to take from the people their liberties, and to transfer the great boon, the elective franchise, from the people to a majority in this House.

And I want to say here that I believe that majorities in legislative bodies are more dangerous than executives. They can be more tyrannical. Besides, there is no restraining power in the Constitution that will punish them for any violation of that instrument. History proves that legislative bodies are aggressive, and that they naturally attempt to encroach upon the rights, powers, and duties of the coordinate branches of government. One usurpation is followed by another, until at last there is but one redress for the people, namely, revolution. If, in process of time by such precedents as a majority of this committee are attempting to establish in this House, the election of its members is transferred from the people to the House itself, the responsibility will be with those who, departing from a well-established line of precedents, may succeed in establishing the precedent. I believe the Constitution of the United States should be changed in regard to contested elections. I do not believe they should come before this House or be adjudicated by it, but that the evidence should be taken by the district court of the United States; and that all contested-election cases should be passed upon by the highest tribunal known in this country, namely, the Supreme Court.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a few moments upon this case, as the report of the minority is so full and exhaustive that it seems but a mere multiplying of words to attempt to add anything to it.

In studying the two reports made in the case, I think one fact must strike every unbiased mind, and that is that all the presumptions, probabilities, and equities are with the minority, and the legal technicalities and quibbles are with the majority. The one report is a statement of facts in favor of a man whom all the evidence and all the circumstances of the case show to have been elected, while the other is a labored legal argument in favor of a minority candidate whom I think no member of the Committee of Elections will claim received a majority of the legal votes of the fifth congressional district of the State of Louisiana. In such a case, while it is our duty to adhere to settled principles and to establish precedents, it seems to me that the House should be satisfied of the cogency of the reasoning and correctness of the law which would seat a man standing in such an unenviable situation; and as in a criminal case it is the duty of a jury to resolve all reasonable doubts in favor of the party on trial, so should this House in a case where it is morally certain that a man is elected in like manner resolve all reasonable doubts in his favor and not presume anything to his detriment. And in this connection, before proceeding to consider the case in detail, I desire to call your attention to a few facts to show that I keep entirely within the record in stating as strongly as I do that it is morally certain that Mr. Morey was elected.

The admitted majority for Mr. Spencer outside the contested territory, the fifth precinct of Concordia Parish and the whole of Carroll, was 1,396. The colored majority in the contested territory was at least 2,000, as appears from the registration of 1874, as in the whole of Concordia Parish there were but 176 white voters and 2,377 colored, while in Carroll there were 444 white and 2,086 colored. The evidence in reference to Carroll shows that no democratic ticket was in the field, and that the republicans were divided into factions on local candidates, but that they all supported Morey, thus rendering it certain that he was elected by at least the majority reported by the minority of the committee, and that Mr. Spencer was a minority candidate and ought not to be seated. Should the evidence not warrant us in seating Mr. Morey, as I have no doubt however it will, shall we place in the seat a man who the evidence plainly shows was not elected, or shall we remand the question to the people, or allow further testimony to be taken? We should remember that it is the people and not this body which elects members of Congress, and we are here merely to decide whom they have elected, and we should not under any circumstances seat a man whom we are satisfied was not elected. If additional testimony will probably remedy the defect, let the parties take it; if it will not, send both candidates back, and let the people decide between them, but in no case should we usurp their prerogative and seat a man we are satisfied did not receive a majority of legal votes.

Coming now to the contested precincts, we will briefly consider them in detail.

FIFTH PRECINCT, CONCORDIA PARISH.

In this precinct the vote as returned stood—Morey 441, Spencer 37. This the majority exclude for two reasons:

First. Because, laboring under a misapprehension of the law as shown by the evidence of all the judges of election, the election board, instead of counting the votes at the polling-place as required by the law, did what they had been accustomed previously to do, took them to Vidalia, the parish seat, and there counted them; and Second. Because unsworn parties were called in and helped them keep the tally.

These were irregularities, violations of directory provisions of the statute, but they do not vitiate the election. The whole evidence shows that the election was fair, that the judges were scrupulously conscientious; that in carrying the ballot-box to Vidalia one judge took the box and another of different party affiliations carried the key; that they avoided even the appearance of evil; that the tally-keepers were called in by them and acted under their supervision, and there is not a scintilla of evidence that raises even a presumption of fraud. The judges signed the returns. We claim that the law in such a case does not allow a precinct to be rejected on such evidence. The judges were honest; they tried to do their duty; and will this House hold that they must be technically correct? Such a determination instead of preventing, opens the door to fraud. It is saying to the world that all that is necessary to destroy an election is to commit some trivial fault; it is a premium to corrupt men, who are on an election board and not in sympathy with the party that is casting the majority of votes at a precinct, that all they need do is to commit some trivial error and they may thereby help their friends to a great extent, more even than they could do in any other way. In some States the party in power in the State appoints virtually all the election boards, so that even in republican counties the judges of the election may be democrats, and it is in their power to destroy the whole election if evilly disposed. To decide that such technicalities amount to anything is to offer a premium for fraud, and we believe this House is not willing to go to that extent. The place where votes are counted and who counts them amounts to nothing unless there is at least evidence to show that they are incorrectly counted. Here there is not a particle, and to deprive Mr. Morey of his majority for such technical reasons would be positively outrageous.

In Carroll Parish, as I have before said, the republican party were divided into two factions in reference to local candidates though not on Congressman. And after the election was over, parties falsified the returns after they had been returned to the clerk's office, so that there are no legal returns of the whole parish to base the finding of any result upon. They were forged and did not even import verity, and are of no assistance to us and must be rejected and thrown out of all consideration in the case, and we must look for evidence aliunde to determine what the returns were. This can be done only in one way, and if this be not legitimate, then we must confess that when returns are corruptly tampered with, lost, or destroyed, practically the election becomes a nullity. Admitting that the returns are originally honestly made, and are afterward lost or destroyed, we claim that the best secondary evidence is that of persons who were present, saw the ballots counted and know the number of votes found by the election board to have been cast for each candidate. Any other rule would be practically a denial of justice, as it would in many cases be a physical impossibility to find all the voters in a precinct or parish, and if found relying on the sacredness of the secret ballot it might be impossible to learn how they voted, and at the best the evidence would be less satisfactory in reference to the true state of the poll than the evidence of men who have a distinct recollection as to what the result really was. We accept the secondary evidence in this case, and any one admitting our right to do that will see that the report of the minority, if wrong at all, errs in favor of the contestant and not the sitting member, for it in each case allows to Mr. Spencer the highest vote any witness swears was cast for him and takes for Mr. Morey the very lowest.

Again, as a legal proposition we claim that while a paper coming from unauthorized hands may be suspicious and fail to prove itself, that it may be proved by parties cognizant with the fact. And if the judges of an election swear a return presented was made and signed by them, we care not from what source it comes, it being so proved is entitled to credit. We care not if corrupt men had them, if the judges of the election or parties making them swear they were the originals executed by them, they must be received. Admitting these principles of law, we find there were returns in the first ward of Carroll duly proved, and that Mr. Morey received 569 votes and Mr. Spencer 33. And more than this, two of the commissioners at this poll testify to the same vote. Having proved what the vote really was, Mr. Morey did all that was required of him. He proved that the election was held, that returns were duly made and signed by the judges, and what those returns showed—the true state of the poll. Having done this, he did all that was requisite. He had on himself the burden of proof after the returns were impeached to show what those returns were, and having done it, relying on the presumption that officers do their duty, he need go no further. And the burden of proof shifts back to the contestant to impeach the fairness of the election. This he has attempted to do, but has made a failure. E. M. Spann, the democratic commissioner of the election, as well as the republican commissioners testify that the election was fair.

Some negroes swear money was used, but while they saw it handed out with registration-papers they totally fail to show whom it was given to and what for, and to what extent the bribery, if bribery it was, affected the poll, and in whose interest the money was paid. So far as this case is concerned, even if it really was a fact that money was improperly used, it is the height of absurdity to suppose it was used by a candidate supported by both factions of the republican party, and who had no inducement to use money.

The evidence in reference to the window, voting on sticks, &c., is all explained, and, while irregular, it was not culpable nor with a fraudulent intent.

Burton's testimony in reference to seeing Jackson change ballots is serious; and if we felt it was true that he as commissioner of election tampered with the ballots we should not dare to consider the returns, as his fraud would so vitiate them that they should be rejected. But we do not believe the testimony. Burton alone testifies to it, and is totally uncorroborated, and we submit whether it is possible that a man should have seen such an outrage committed, ballots absolutely changed, and he have kept his peace. And while he now swears to it positively, it is noticeable that, in his conversations in reference to the election after it was over, while he, a defeated candidate, naturally complained of the result, he did not speak of this; and the democratic commissioner, Spann, does not remember the conversation between Burton and Jackson. We submit whether it is reasonable. Burton complained to Jackson, but in such a mild way that the disinterested democratic commissioner, who cared nothing for the republican wrangle and would naturally desire to see impartial justice done, never heard anything of it. In conversations afterward this same witness stated irregularities at the same poll, and complained bitterly, as a defeated candidate naturally would: but he never mentioned this transaction as one of his causes of complaint. Under these circumstances his evidence is unworthy of credit. I am satisfied the election at the precinct was fair and free.

In the second precinct there is no claim of fraud, and the only question is whether we shall admit secondary evidence of the true state of the poll. We have in the minority report allowed Mr. Spencer the highest number of votes any witness swore he received, and Mr. Morey the lowest, which is certainly fair to the contestant. The third precinct stands in substantially the same situation, and in our judgment Mr. Morey was elected by the majority reported by the minority.

We certainly believe the report of the minority should be adopted and Mr. Morey retain his seat.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to enter a privileged motion, a motion to reconsider the vote of the House yesterday by which the resolution was adopted giving certain powers to the Louisiana Investigating Committee while in New Orleans. I desire simply to perfect the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOSKINS.) The Chair is informed that yesterday a motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted and that the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. KASSON. I did not so understand, and I was giving particular attention to the matter at the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The RECORD, also, so states it.

Mr. KASSON. I find that the RECORD does so state it, and that I am in error. The motion to reconsider, therefore, is not in order. I shall endeavor to get at it in another way.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of Edward O'M. Condon.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General.

ELECTION CONTEST—SPENCER VS. MOREY.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I admit that any speech or argument which I may make upon the case now at the bar of this House will seem to be almost a work of supererogation. The gentlemen of the committee who are to follow me, eminent as lawyers and statesmen, will give this House a most thorough comprehension of the case before the debate closes. But the contestant himself is absent, and he asked me before leaving to represent him here in the debate upon his contest, and this I purpose to do as briefly as I can.

It has been said here to-day that he relied simply and solely upon the technicalities of the law, which are so often used to pierce the breast of justice. And now I appeal to that party to which I belong; to that party to which these gentlemen belong who have presented the majority report; I appeal to each and every one to rise above the partisan, and, if they find no more in this contest than these mere technicalities, then on contestant's behalf, with full power to speak for him, I ask you to send him back home and deny his right to sit here.

Mr. Speaker, as has been stated by the two gentlemen who preceded me, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WELLS,] this contest is narrowed down to four wards; one ward in the parish of Concordia and three wards of the parish of Carroll, and in considering them, sir, I shall take them up in the order in which the chairman of the subcommittee who submitted the majority report has presented them. The fifth ward, parish of Concordia, returned a majority of 404 for the sitting member. It is contended by the contestant because certain provisions of the law which he deems mandatory in their character were ruthlessly and recklessly disregarded by the commissioners who presided at that poll, but by the minority report that these provisions of law so utterly violated and set at naught are not mandatory; that they are in their character merely directory; that being merely directory provisions of law, they might bend to the whims, and convenience, and caprice of the commissioners.

Let us see, sir, what is a mandatory provision of law. Is it not a provision of law which goes to the very essence of the subject-matter? Is it not a provision of law which, being violated or disregarded, the whole subject-matter is vitiated and tainted? What is an election? The deposit of the votes and the count of the votes. That constitutes an election.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of law that affect and control the deposit and counting of votes are mandatory, because they directly affect the two essentials of an election. In the method of receiving and counting the votes the law is peremptory, and no discretion is allowed the officers charged with the conduct of the election in regard to these essentials.

But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] says that these provisions of the election law of Louisiana have already been construed by the supreme court of Louisiana. It is not the first time in the Congress of the United States that the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana has been invoked to sustain an enormity. Sir, reverence for the bench I learned as among the first of my lessons as a lawyer. It was taught by my father, himself a lawyer and judge, and it was taught me, too, by those learned and venerable men under whose ministrations I sat and learned what little I know of law. Ignorance may preside on the bench, eccentricity may be illustrated and idiosyncrasies be developed on the bench, but so long as purity is there I bow my head in reverence before the judicial tribunals of my country. But the supreme court of Louisiana is not beyond reproach. Its chief justice is smarting to-day under the galling and stinging lash of the Supreme Court of the United States in that sad decree in which the members of our most illustrious court decided that he had been guilty of fraud and duplicity unworthy a man, much less a judge. In 1872, in the third session of the Forty-second Congress, the decision of the Louisiana supreme court was invoked to sustain an enormous usurpation in the Senate of the United States, and it was then that the committee of the Senate, Mr. Carpenter at its head, set aside that decision and adopted the dissenting opinion of Judge Wylie as their view of the law of the case. I refer to the case of the State of Louisiana Ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Jack Wharton et al.

Sir, gentlemen may invoke the decision of that tribunal; gentlemen may call them judges. But the men constituting the majority of that court, placed by the most sacred shrine of liberty's temple to administer the solemn and beautiful rites of the Constitution, straightway robed themselves in the dark vestments of partisan priesthood, and have sacrificed their sense of truth and justice, their honor, and their all upon the altar of party and of self. In all the sad and blackened history of that once proud and ever-beautiful State, which I in part represent, and which holds and bounds all that I love and hope, the blackest feature has been the character and bearing of its highest judicial tribunal. When partisan aims were to be accomplished, it was ever ready with the requisite jurisdiction and decree. When the voice of right and truth were to be stifled, its ear was as cold and dead as the marble statue that heard not Cæsar's fall. In all of Louisiana's struggles with spoilsmen and public robbers and favored monopolists, the supreme court of that State has been on the side of the spoilsmen. No conflict between the people as against wrong and crime has occurred, but this same supreme court ranged its power with the wrong and the crime. No tax was so excessive, no impost so grinding, no overthrow of popular will so enormous and flagrant for that supreme court to enforce and decree, and with eager hands they have hastened to affix the seal of their judicial sanction upon any and every enormity demanded by robber greed or partisan exigency.

In the calm reflective light of the future men will look back to the record of that court and marvel at the depth of its infamy. Pilloried in the execration and contempt of the wise and the good, it must ever be the judge's shame, the lawyer's blush. And when the glad day of our deliverance shall come, and it requires no prophet's eye to see even now the flushing of its kindling splendors, the people of Louisiana shall draw around that court's history and its volumed reports the black lines of their condemnation, and let them forever remain the apocrypha of our jurisprudence, never to be referred to as precedent or authority in any court or case. And yet it is but just to say that the frequent and able dissenting opinions of Wylie and Morgan show that they were true to their judicial duties, and that their brains and heart were never in all the record of this sad betrayal of law and right. I take it, therefore, that but little weight will be given to the partisan decree of the supreme court of Louisiana in the case of Burton vs. Hicks, cited by the gentleman from Mississippi. In that case there was a dissenting opinion by Judges Morgan and Wylie, in which they characterize these provisions of law regulating the counting and care of the ballots as mandatory. So also held Judge Hough, the district judge, who tried the case in the court, "a qua."

Justices Morgan and Wylie, of the supreme court, in their opinion in the case of Burton vs. Hicks (see Records, 158) well say: "The votes are to be counted by the commissioners at each voting-place immediately after closing the election, and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. These provisions of the law are not only directory, they are peremptory, and they were enacted, I think, in order that the people should be assured a fair ballot, a fair count, and an honest return."

McCrary (Law of Elections, section 393) says: "One of the most important and imperative requirements of the law of election is that the ballots from the time they are cast until they are canvassed must be safely and securely kept. Frauds upon the ballot-box are very frequently perpetrated by tampering with the ballots after they are cast and before they are counted. It is for this reason that in many of the States there are statutes requiring that the ballots be publicly canvassed immediately upon the closing of the polls." * * "It is clear that where the law which requires the ballots to be safely and securely kept until canvassed and the result announced has been so grossly violated as to have afforded opportunity for fraud and tampering, the burden of proof should be shifted."

Turning then to sections 1, 13, and 43 of the election law of Louisiana, the very sections declared by the majority of the supreme court in the case cited by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WELLS,] we find that they relate particularly to the count of the vote and the time and place of the election and the count. Let us see:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened. That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the General Assembly, and for Members of Congress shall be held on the first Monday in November, and said election shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and no other.

The supreme court of Louisiana decides this section merely directory. Yet it fixes the time of holding the election. Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, page 619, declares: "Time and place are of the substance of every election, and a failure to comply with the law in these particulars is not to be treated as a mere irregularity."

But I call the attention of the House to the unusual language of this section which declares that "all elections," &c.," shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and no other." No discretion is left to the officers of the election as to conduct.

The section is clearly mandatory in its character, notwithstanding the decree of the supreme court, relied on by the sitting member.

But again, section 13 is declared in that same decree to be "merely directory." Let us see what it is:

SEC. 13. Be it further enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election at each poll or voting-place to keep a list of the names of the persons voting at such poll or voting-place, which list shall be numbered from 1 to the end; and said list of voters, with their names and numbers as aforesaid, shall be signed and sworn to as correct by the commissioners immediately on closing the polls, and before leaving the place, and before opening the box. If no judge, or justice of the peace, or other person authorized to administer such oath be present to do so, it may be administered by any voter. The votes shall be counted by the commissioners at each voting-place immediately after closing the election and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present. Tally-lists shall be kept of the count, and after the count the ballots counted shall be put back into the box and preserved until after the next term of the criminal or district court, as the case may be; and in the parishes, except Orleans, the commissioners of election, or any one of them selected for that purpose, shall carry the box and deliver it to the clerk of the district court, who shall preserve the same as above required; and in the parish of Orleans the box shall be delivered to the clerk of the first district court for the parish of Orleans, and be kept by him as above directed.

It is seen at a glance that this section provides the method of counting the vote. The count of the vote is the second essential element of an election. The section declares how and when and where the vote shall be counted, thus going to and directly affecting this important essential. Now turn to the next section decreed to be "merely directory:"

SEC. 43. Be it further enacted, &c., That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes, as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for and the offices for which they were voted for and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish, and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all of such commissioners in person within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisors of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns with the originals received by him to the returning officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

Here again are provisions directly affecting and regulating the counting of the vote and the formation and preservation of the evidence or result of the count, and yet these sections are decided by the supreme court of Louisiana to be "merely directory" in their character, and, with a flippancy and flagrant disregard of the sacred right and purity of the ballot, it is decreed in substance that their violation does not affect or vitiate the election.

Ay, sir, under the recognized doctrine of the supreme court of Louisiana there are but two requisites to a valid election: The one is the deposit of the ballots and the other is the count—not of the ballots—but of the returning board. In that State the people go through the farce of voting, and then the returning board assembles and elects whom it pleases, and if we dare complain we are quieted by the bayonet. For has not that same immaculate supreme court stamped its approving seal upon all the infamous work of the infamous returning board and declared that its return was final and conclusive? Such is its settled doctrine.

So much, sir, for the Louisiana supreme court and its decisions.

But suppose it were a tribunal which commanded that reverence and respect which ought to attach to so high a tribunal, could its decree be invoked to cramp or dwarf the constitutional power of Congress to judge of the election and qualification of its members and, in the performance or exercise of this power, to bind Congress to accept its interpretation of those statutes under which the election was held and out of which the case for the judgment of Congress arose? The doctrine is monstrous, and cannot be successfully contended for an instant.

In the exercise of the powers conferred by the Constitution Congress is supreme, and its jurisdiction of any question confided to it and its decision thereon are unlimited and absolute; and no decision of any court can be invoked as binding upon Congress in any case specially confided to Congress for decision by the fundamental law.

A portion of section 13 of the Louisiana election law is designed to secure correct evidence of the election, making it peremptory upon the commissioners to perform certain functions immediately at the voting-place and after the closing of the polls. Yet we are told by the supreme court of Louisiana that these provisions are merely directory, and that their violation or disregard does not vitiate the election.

I read now from McCrary's Law of Contested Elections:

Where, as is the case in several of the States, the statute provides a mode of preserving the indentical ballots cast at an election, for the purpose of being used as evidence in case of contest, such statute, and particularly those provisions which provide for the safe-keeping of such ballots, must be followed with great care. The danger that, after the count is made known, (especially if the vote is very close,) the ballots may be tampered with, is so great that no opportunity for such tampering can be permitted. Such ballots, in order to be received in evidence, must have remained in the custody of the proper officers of the law from the time of the original official count until they are produced before the proper court or officer, and if it appear that they have been handled by unauthorized persons, or that they have been left in an exposed and improper place, they cannot be offered to overcome the official count.

And again the same authority declares:

One of the most important and imperative requirements of the law of elections is that the ballots from the time they are cast until they are canvassed must be safely and securely kept. Frauds upon the ballot-box are very frequently perpetrated by tampering with the ballots after they are cast and before they are counted. It is for this reason that in many of the States there are statutes requiring that the ballots be publicly canvassed immediately upon the closing of the polls.

This doctrine is strengthened and sustained by Judge Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, page 617, where he says:

And it was said, in the same case, that any irregularity in conducting an election which does not deprive a legal voter of his vote, or admit a disqualified voter to vote, or cast uncertainty upon the result.

Mark the words: "cast uncertainty upon the result."

There is but one conclusion, that these provisions of the law were mandatory; and being mandatory, and being violated, the election is so vitiated that the returns lose their prima facie character, and cannot be relied upon, and there must be proof aliunde.

Now, let us go to the record. The evidence shows that immediately after the close of the polls these commissioners at the fifth ward of Concordia Parish violated three mandatory and imperative provisions of the election law of Louisiana. In the first place they failed to make up a list of voters and to swear to it. In the second place they removed the ballot-box. In the third place they failed to keep the tally-list while the ballots were counted. They violated three provisions of law in regard to the count of votes, which is the second essential of a fair and honest election. Mr. Dameron swears that they did not know they were doing wrong; that he had left his instruction book at home, and that the other commissioners were not willing to count the votes at the polls. Both of the other commissioners swear that that was not true and that neither of them opposed the count at the polls.

But one of them says that it was his idea, reasoning from what had been the old election law, that they must carry the ballots to Vidalia to be counted. Now, the old election law required them to carry the ballots to the county seat to be counted by the supervisor. But if they were attempting to proceed under and according to their remembrance of the old election law, why did they not carry it out fully and do what the old law required, and deliver the box to the parish supervisor? No, sir; they knew enough to remove the box sixteen miles from the polling-place to Vidalia at the dead of night, and arriving there they bethought themselves of the necessity for a count, and went up-stairs to the room of the tax-collector and counted awhile, then went to bed and counted again next morning, and leisurely on to the end. Their testimony in regard to the way that the box was carried to Vidalia betrays upon their part a consciousness of guilt and wrong. They impress one by their testimony with the idea that they were awfully afraid they would steal the ballots and commit a fraud. Dameron took the box, and he is very careful to tell us that some one else took the key; and when the box was changed to the custody of some one else the custody of the key was also changed. Like the kleptomaniac in the presence of temptation, who bids his less afflicted friend, "Watch me or I will steal something," these commissioners seek to impress us with the idea that they were guarding themselves and each other, lest a fraud might be perpetrated. They betrayed full knowledge of the impropriety of their conduct, and took these precautionary measures in order to be able to testify that their conduct was fair and that no fraud was consummated.

Be that as it may, their reckless disregard and violation of the peremptory provisions of the election law—the removal of the box, the delay in the count, the neglect to make up and swear to the list of voters, and their allowing the tally-sheets to be kept by any lounging loafer that happened to come along—all these violations of law do "cast uncertainty on the result," "do destroy the prima facie character of the returns," do vitiate the election at that box, so that, in order to be counted, they must be sustained by evidence aliunde. Where is it? Mr. Speaker, it is not in the record of this case. The sitting member, in order to bolster up the dishonored and weakened returns of these commissioners, introduces them, and they testify. Of course they declare that all was fair and right. But is their sworn testimony "evidence aliunde?" Is their oath, taken months after the election, any better or stronger or more satisfactory than their sworn returns originally were?

"Evidence aliunde" means evidence outside of, independent of, and distinct from the evidence of the commissioners, but corroborative of their returns. With what toleration would a court hear a discredited witness bolster his shaken testimony by again swearing that what he had testified to was true? Would his second oath be better than his first?

If you are not going to take their original return, if the law declares that the prima facie character of their sworn return is vitiated by their violation of law, then you cannot accept their mere sworn statements made six months afterward as to the conduct of the election as the aliunde evidence required by the law! The contestee has utterly failed to comply with the requirements of the law to supply aliunde the evidence which is required in regard to this poll, and it must be excluded from the count.

But glance for a moment at their testimony. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] has already referred to it, and has shown how worthless it is. But I will be pardoned for recalling it. I refer to the evidence of the commissioners as to how the tally-sheets were kept.

When votes are called off at the polls, somebody keeps the tally. But the tally-sheets are no evidence of the election whatever, and no part of the returns. They are a mere series of straight marks and names, which may be multiplied and prolonged indefinitely. These commissioners do not know whether the tally was correctly kept or not. They distinctly state that the returns were calculated from these tally-sheets kept by Tom, Dick, and Harry, or any idler or loafer who came into the room during the count. This was the basis on which they made their returns; and when put to the test they declare that "they do not know whether these tally-lists were correctly kept or not; that they were kept as well as they could be under the circumstances." I contend, therefore, that under the law and the authorities there is not the slightest legal reason or excuse for counting this poll, and that it must be rejected. Rejecting it, Mr. Spencer has a majority of 1,396 to entitle him to a seat in this House.

Now let us go to that "happy land" of Carroll. O, sir, it is enough to make an American blush to read the record of that election. The forces were well distributed. They were all the partisans of the contestee; but in saying this I exonerate him in the fullest degree from any complicity whatever in the most damning forgeries and frauds practiced by that precious set of scoundrels in Carroll Parish, as developed by the record of this case. The forces were well disposed and arranged for frauds. David Jackson, clerk of the court, was "chief cook and bottle-washer" at poll No. 1. W. W. Benham, the forger and perjurer, was the presiding genius at the second ward. The third conspirator, R. K. Anderson, presided at the third ward; and, mark you, these were the strong wards of the parish. It must strike this House as strange that in those wards, where the vote was light and pretty evenly divided between Spencer and Morey, the majority either way being small, everything seemed to be conducted regularly. But where the result was decidedly changed and the voting heavy, every particle of evidence in regard to the election, except in a single instance, is entirely missing, and fraud and crime leap and lurk in every line of the testimony.

But I am a little ahead of my argument. The returning board counted the vote of Carroll Parish. That board says of its own action (I will not read it; it is here in the record) in regard to Carroll Parish that there was evidence that the returns were forged and falsified. But they took pains to ascertain what the result was, and they counted it exactly as they thought it should be counted; exactly as "honest John Lynch" did in 1872 when the State of Louisiana was stolen by the radical party. "Honest John" said, "We had no return whatever before us, but we took the census and such other facts as we could get at and we fixed it up as we thought it should be." I presume that no intelligent man will give the slightest weight to the action of the returning board of Louisiana. The damning record of its infamy, its robber greed and disregard of every written or unwritten law of right or morals, its shameless theft of a people's birthright, its falsehoods and its perjuries, its usurpations, form the blackest page of the history of this country. Twice has it thwarted and overthrown the will of the people of Louisiana and fastened the shackles upon them. It will not do so the third time. The sublime faith of that people is exhausted, and the determination to express their will and to have it enforced and carried out is the watchword of their hearts and dwells a sublime inspiration in their every soul. In November the people, and not the returning board, will elect.

But, sir, to the argument. The contestant comes to Carroll Parish with 1,396 majority. The sitting member alleges he has some 2,000 majority in that parish; but when asked for the evidence he fails to produce it.

The law requires that the evidences of the election shall be preserved in duplicate, and that one set of returns shall be deposited with the clerk of the court and the other sent to the returning board at New Orleans. The returning board had no returns before it, except such as were declared to be falsified and forged. Its forgery was proven beyond all doubt by the commissioners themselves. It was detected by Mr. Arroyo, the sole democrat of the returning board, but who resigned from it before its work was done, because of the villainy and frauds of its other members, which he was powerless to prevent.

There being no lawful returns before the returning board, search is made at the other place of deposit for the other duplicate original return required by law to be kept there. But it, too, is missing and cannot be found. Where, then, is your evidence of the election? It cannot be found in either place, and it devolves upon the contestee to supply its place. How does he do it? He summons witnesses; and for the first ward, Mr. R. K. Anderson, who, mark you, presided at the third ward, produces from his pocket a document which he calls "the election returns from the first ward." What was he doing with them? How came he to have them? Where did he get them? The clerk did not have them. They were not in New Orleans. The true returns of the election could not be found at either place of legal deposit. How came Mr. R. K. Anderson to have them? He testifies that he obtained them from the clerk of the court and had had them under lock and key for six months. Who made him the custodian of those papers? No one. It is testified, I believe, that Jackson and Anderson deposited those returns with the clerk of the court. But Jackson was himself the clerk of the court. What had become of these returns? They were not to be found. How came R. K. Anderson with this paper? He says somebody gave it to him and he had had it for safe-keeping. I will say that this paper in form appears to be regular, and meets the legal requirements of an election return. But, sir, events transpired at that poll which will not permit this House to entertain its count for a moment. David Jackson, who presided there as "boss," evidently took a lofty view of his duties as commissioner, for he immediately proceeded to put the ballot-box seven or eight feet above the ground in a cabin with the door barred and the window nailed up with slats about two or three inches apart.

The testimony is that the tallest of those who had assembled to vote by getting close up could put his ballot in through the slats, while others thrust them in on the ends of sticks; that the ballot-box and commissioners were out of sight of the voters, and that money was paid out at the window for votes by this man David Jackson.

The law of Louisiana says that the ballot-box shall be deposited in a manner convenient to the voter and in his view; that the voter shall have the right to put the ballot in with his own hands; that the commissioner is the only person who may take the ballot from his hand, and it provides a penalty against any one taking the ballot from the hands of the voter other than the commissioner.

It is shown that Cain Sartain, a distinguished colored statesman, and then candidate for the Legislature, in the full enjoyment of his newly found franchises and glorying in his right to vote, voted frequently during the day. Cæsar Johnson and Noah Lane saw David Jackson buy votes and pay money for them, and J. E. Burton swears that he saw David change votes, drop the real ballot on the floor and substitute other ballots, which he placed in the box; that he called Jackson's attention to the fact, and David denied it; but when witness pointed to the ballots that had been dropped on the floor, he did not deny it or answer, nor does he deny it anywhere in this record. What credit or faith can be given to the result at this poll? In the Law of Elections (by McCrary) it is laid down at page 335:

> If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot-box, the better opinion is that it will destroy the integrity of his official acts, even though the fraud discovered be not sufficient of itself to affect the result. * * * If, for example, an election officer having charge of a ballot-box is caught in the act of abstracting certain ballots and substituting others, although the number shown to have been abstracted be not sufficient to affect the result, yet no confidence can be placed in the contents of a ballot-box which has been in his custody.

Yet we are asked to count that poll. I say, no matter how perfect in form, no matter how perfectly that return produced by R. K. Anderson may comply with the requirements of the election, the well-settled jurisprudence of contested elections, you cannot count that return. Stained with infamous crimes and marked by total disregard of law and decency, the "return" produced by Mr. R. K. Anderson and so confidently relied on by the sitting member cannot be counted. So much for poll 1, Carroll Parish.

Bear in mind that contestant's majority is yet 1,396 votes.

We come now to ward No. 2. There is a perfect blank here; nothing; no return, no tally-sheet, no list of voters, no statement whatever.

Mr. POPPLETON. No ballots.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir. No ballots; not the scratch of a pen to show that an election had ever been held at poll 2. How does the contestee seek to supply the place of this suspiciously missing testimony? He swears a witness. Who is it? Why, no other than W. W. Benham, the perjurer; a man contradicted in the record half a dozen times; a convicted forger and falsifier of returns, whose personal liberty to-day is an outrage upon the rights and dress of the penitentiary that vainly gapes for him, and Benham swears that the returns from the second ward were all regularly and properly made and the vote was so and so.

Mr. Speaker, right here I interpose a legal objection; and it is this, that wherever the legal returns of an election are lost and the party wishes to supply their place, what is the legal course for him to pursue? In the first place he must show these returns were made; in the second place he must show that they are lost and beyond his reach; and in the third place he must furnish the best secondary evidence within his power to produce. This principle of law is too well settled to admit of argument or dispute.

The best evidence of an election is the testimony of the voters themselves as to how and for whom they voted. But for convenience the law has substituted as ordinarily the best evidence the returns when properly kept and evidenced. These returns constitute the prima facie evidence of election. Where they are destroyed or lost, then the voters may be called. By substitution of law their testimony then has become secondary, though in a contest the returns would be obliged to yield to the oaths of the voters. In the second ward of Carroll, the returns, the ballots, the tally-sheets were all gone. Who stole them it is impossible to say. The evidence shows that the crime of the theft and destruction of these evidences of election lies between Mr. W. W. Benham, David Jackson, and R. K. Anderson, all three of whom are the zealous partisans and chief witnesses of the sitting member. To supply the place of this testimony he introduces and swears this man Benham, whose lips are blistered and whose tongue is poison-dripping with perjury. Benham comes and swears that the returns of ward No. 2 were regularly made out and then summons his recollection and tells us what these returns were. Can such proof be received? Will this House accept this as legitimate secondary proof? Will it open this door to fraud and crime? If so, then how easy for corrupt returning officers to destroy returns and then substitute their false oaths, and transfer to the fell spirit of perjury the power to elect.

Mr. MOREY. I wish to ask the gentleman, if he holds that, where a paper has been made out and sworn to, if the evidence of the man making it as to its contents is not primary and the evidence of the voter is not secondary?

Mr. ELLIS. Do you mean by "a paper" an election return?

Mr. MOREY. W. W. Benham swears he made the return, and the return is proven to be lost—no matter how or by whom it was lost; it is lost and cannot be found. Now we call Benham, one of the commissioners who made the return, to prove its contents. Does the gentleman call that secondary evidence?

Mr. ELLIS. Undoubtedly it is the proof by parol of the contents of a document shown to be lost. But in this case, under the well-settled rules of election contests, the voters themselves should have been called. The evidence of Benham is not secondary; it is tertiary in its character. You have utterly failed to supply by the best evidence the loss or theft of the returns; and I interpose the legal objection and insist that Benham's evidence be excluded. But grant that this evidence would be legitimate and regular and waive for the moment every objection as to its admissibility, can you believe Benham? He swears that the returns were fully and properly made; but Montgomery, who was one of the commissioners at poll No. 2, swears he signed no returns. Blount also proves that he did not. Arroyo swore and so did Montgomery that the signature of the latter to the returns before the returning board was false and forged. Who committed the forgery? Benham admits that he placed those returns, shown to be false and forged, and so admitted by this unwilling returning board. The brother of Benham was detected some time after the election in a house on Jackson street, three miles from the State-house, with the lists and returns before him, which he was manipulating. W. W. Benham and C. C. Benham are the forgers and perpetrators of this stupendous fraud.

Mr. MOREY. There is nothing of that sort in the record.

Mr. ELLIS. Is there not?

Mr. MOREY. No, it was all excluded.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask pardon for going out of the record. I did so unwittingly. But I will say in justice to myself that, whether in or out of the record, what I stated was true, because I was one among those who heard of C. C. Benham's operations, and was consulted as to the best means of detecting and punishing him for his fraud upon the returns. Under the well-settled rule of law which I cited from McCrary, this man W. W. Benham, convicted of perjury and forgery, detected in a deliberate fraud upon the election, has destroyed all faith in his official acts and character, has vitiated all the evidences of this election, and this House cannot believe his returns even if they were here, much less can it accept and believe his parol testimony as to what those returns were. Then all proof as to the second ward of Carroll having failed, we find contestant still elected by nearly 1,400 majority.

And now we come to the third ward of Carroll Parish. The three commissioners were R. K. Anderson, Dubb Anderson, and R. M. Bagley. The first of these worthies was the man who supplied from his pocket the pretended returns from the first ward. But he was unable to produce any returns whatever from the third ward where he presided. Here, as in ward No. 2, all returns of the election and all evidences of it are gone. R. K. Anderson testifies that he violated the law in failing to make duplicate returns. It also appears that the box was removed from poll 3 and carried to Providence; that the votes were not counted until thirty-six hours after the polls had closed. Here were plain, palpable violations of the most peremptory requirements of the law which destroy the prima facie character of the returns even if they were in evidence. With what patience shall we hear the law-breaker, R. K. Anderson, testify as to what these dishonored returns were. Mr. Bagley, one of the commissioners swears:

The ballots were not counted nor returns made out until thirty-six hours after the closing of the polls. The official count upon which the returns were made was made in Providence thirty-six hours after the close of the election. The box was opened at the poll at the conclusion of the election and the names of persons voted for called off; but there was no official count kept of them at that time.

Again he says:

At the conclusion of the tallying of the votes at the poll, and, I think, without having cast up the tallies, the ballot-box, with the tally-sheets, votes, &c., in it, sealed up, was taken to Providence by R. K. Anderson and Nelson Blackwell, republican deputy United States supervisor for said poll, to be delivered to the clerk of the court. I went to Providence on Wednesday, and, with the other commissioners, recounted the votes. Finding them to correspond with the tally-sheets, we made up the returns and signed them, and swore to their correctness.

Again he says:

I was not constantly with it. I saw the box in Providence on Tuesday evening, in possession of the republican deputy United States supervisor and Mr. Anderson. They took the box out of Providence that evening. I do not know of my own knowledge where they took it.

Question. Why were you not with that box all the time?

Answer. We, the commissioners, agreed to put the box in the hands of the said United States supervisor to bring to Providence. This arrangement was made for our mutual convenience.

Q. In making your tally-list did you verify it by the votes themselves?

A. I did not.

In regard to these returns Mr. Arroyo swears:

Question. The board did so recognize these returns as forgeries?

Answer. That is, there were affidavits read before the board by these three gentlemen stating the actual number of votes cast in their respective polls, and if there was any other statement it was false and their signatures to such statement forgeries.

Mr. Zachariah also testifies:

Mr. Bagley made a subsequent affidavit, in which he alleged that what purported to be the correct returns from that poll was a forgery, in two respects: First, the signature purporting to be his was not his signature, and, secondly, that the true, original tally-sheet had been made out in red ink, whereas that shown the board was made out in black ink, showing conclusively that Mr. Bagley made two affidavits.

Under such proof and the plain provisions of the law already cited the evidence as to the returns from poll 3 must be rejected.

But Mr. R. K. Anderson does not even swear as to what the returns were. He wanders off into the mazes of a somewhat treacherous memory, and gives us "his recollection" of the respective votes of contestee and contestant. He says:

My recollection is that there were 550 votes cast in all. There were 7 votes cast for Spencer, 2 blank as to member of Congress, and the balance for Morey.

Mr. Arroyo says that "the recollection" of another witness, who was also a commissioner, gave Morey 510 votes and Spencer 7. Here is a discrepancy in the "recollections" of two witnesses of 31 votes, enough to turn the tide of many an election. I recall this fact merely to illustrate the great danger of accepting such testimony, that this House may be warned against setting a precedent which is fraught with so much danger to the truth and purity of elections.

Mr. Speaker, I have but to add that, excluding the fifth poll of Concordia Parish, contestant is yet elected by 1,396 majority. But if the House fails to regard the election at that poll in the clear light in which it appears to me, and admits it, then is contestant still elected by nearly one thousand majority. I ask this House to sustain the majority report and to admit the chosen Representative of a people already too long disfranchised to his right to a seat on this floor. And I thank the House for its attention.

Mr. DE BOLT. Mr. Speaker, in the investigation of this case I endeavored to give it a careful and impartial consideration. I have found nothing in the evidence that attaches blame directly or indirectly to the contestee; nothing in the testimony which connects him in any manner in any of the frauds which appear in the evidence. In the discussion of the case I shall take up the matter as presented in the report, commencing with the fifth ward of Concordia Parish.

The law requiring the commissioners of the election to count the ballots at the place where the election was held has already been presented to the House, and therefore I shall not read it; but instead of complying with the law, when the polls were closed the commissioners proceeded with the ballot-box to the county seat, some sixteen miles distant, where they counted the votes. It has been stated, and most of the gentlemen's arguments were confined to that one point, that a majority of the committee hold that that poll should not be counted, from the single fact that the ballot-box had been removed from the place where the ballots were cast. My friend from Mississippi could have saved much time and labor by reading the report of the majority of the committee. They do not hold, nor do I think any member of the House believes, that the removal of the ballot-box before counting the vote was in itself such an irregularity as to vitiate the poll; but there are other irregularities which, when taken together, are sufficient to warrant the throwing out of the entire poll. There is no evidence that any fraud was committed by the commissioners or that they intended any fraud in the removing of the box. But when they proceeded to count the ballots they called upon by-standers, idlers, men who were unsworn—we know not who they were—and so far as our knowledge extends they may have been wholly irresponsible. These men are called upon to keep the tally-lists.

One of the commissioners, Mr. Dameron, swears that it was kept under the supervision of the commissioners. I admit that, for such is the evidence. But let us examine how these votes were counted out. The evidence shows that one of the judges took the votes out of the box and called off the names, passed them to another who strung them, and when counted the ballots are to be placed in the box and delivered to the clerk of the court.

Now, how much attention could the commissioners possibly have given to the tally-keepers? Suppose that they are at a table two and a half or three feet wide; the tally-keepers on one side and the judges of the election on the other. How much attention can the judges of the election pay to the tally-keepers when they are themselves busily engaged with the ballots? These men who were unsworn may have been interested in the result of the election, and no doubt they were. They could have committed many errors by placing the marks opposite the wrong name, and it would have been impossible for the commissioners to have corrected them after the counting was over.

There was but one tally-keeper serving at a time. There was but a single tally-sheet kept by these three unsworn parties. One would keep it for a while and then he would retire and another would relieve him. How easy it was for them to practice a fraud.

I hold this to be true, that up to the time the commissioners reached the county seat and commenced the count of these ballots the presumption of law is all in their favor that they were doing just what the law requires. But when these unsworn men took hold of the tally-sheets and marked down the number received for each candidate, then I say the paper loses its prima facie character and requires evidence aliunde to make it what it ought to be. I hold that there is not one particle of evidence in this whole record showing that there is any testimony aliunde to support these tally-sheets.

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] says that these commissioners swore to these papers. They did; but did their oath strengthen them? The law requires the commissioners to make the returns. The returns are made from the tally-sheets; in fact the tally-sheets are the returns themselves, with the affidavits of the commissioners attached. If the tally-sheets are erroneously kept, then the whole return is unreliable and of no value.

Therefore, when we find that this tally-sheet was kept by irresponsible men, men who were entire strangers there, who were not at the polls at which the votes were cast so far as we know, who lived sixteen miles away, then I say that the tally-sheet is entitled to no credit without other testimony to make it so. Now, whose testimony is necessary? Is it the testimony of the judges? They did swear that it was kept under their supervision. They do not say that they ever examined the paper, but they swear to it. Does that add to its value? Certainly not, because they know nothing as to its reliability.

Now, who are the men who know about it? The tally-keepers. But none of them are sworn, and we do not know whether they kept the tally-sheet correctly or not. That is left entirely to inference. That is the reason why I am in favor of throwing out that poll.

Mr. Dameron says that the tally-sheets were kept as regularly as they could be under the circumstances. Let me read what he says:

I don't think the tally-lists were very regularly kept, as we had no regular tally-keepers, and had to pick them up as we could get them. I believe the tally-lists were kept as correctly as they could have been kept under the circumstances.

Then we have the United States supervisor who swears to the same thing: who says that he has closely and carefully examined the statement of Mr. Dameron, and that he agrees with him in every particular.

Mr. Columbus, another one of the commissioners, testifies to the same thing. So does Mr. Jefferson, the other commissioner. All testify that those tally-sheets were not regularly kept.

I now pass to poll No. 1, Carroll Parish. We find that as to this poll no returns have been made to the county clerk as required by law. Nowhere in his office can any such paper be found. On his examination, when he is asked whether any such boxes, ballots, papers, returns, or tally-sheets were ever filed in his office, he says, "Not one." But we find in the hands of R. K. Anderson a paper purporting to be a return from poll No. 1. That paper is identified by the three commissioners as being the return made by them from that poll.

It appears upon the face of this paper and the evidence of the three commissioners that this return is genuine and ought to be received; and if there were no other testimony in regard to it, I would be in favor of receiving and counting it. But I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to another matter which has not been mentioned; and I wondered that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] did not notice it, because upon that particular I for one hold that that poll should not be counted. When the ballots were being received in the morning the box was placed near the door; but the rush of the crowd broke down the slats in the door, and then the box was removed to a window. David Jackson, the county clerk, and one of the commissioners, too, says that he set the box near the window. Mr. Burton says that it was set at least two feet from the window for a while; bat persons ran their hands too far through, and then the commissioners moved it back at least four feet from the window. The window was six feet from the ground. The witnesses differ one or two inches as to the height; but in general the evidence shows it to have been about six feet. That perhaps is not an irregularity sufficient to vitiate this poll. But this same man, Mr. Burton, who was a candidate—my friend says that there are not democrats enough in that county to be candidates, therefore he must have been a republican candidate—swears that he saw David Jackson, a republican commissioner, changing ballots after they had been received from the voters, throwing upon the floor the ballots received, and putting into the box other ballots. I will read the evidence:

Question. How many did you see Mr. Jackson change?

Answer. I saw him change but one; but I saw another one just like it lying on the floor. Then he tried to bluff me out of it, but I showed him the one on the floor, and he said, "Well, that will make no difference."

I will read what Mr. McCrary says in his work on the Law of Elections in regard to the fraud of an officer:

If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot-box, the better opinion is that this will destroy the integrity of his official acts, even though the fraud discovered is not of itself sufficient to affect the result. The reason of this rule is that an officer who betrays his trust in one instance is shown to be capable of the infamy of defrauding the electors, and his certificate is therefore good for nothing. If, for example, an election officer, having charge of a ballot-box prior to or during the canvass, is caught in the act of abstracting certain ballots, and substituting others, although the number shown to have been abstracted be not sufficient to affect the result, yet no confidence can be placed in the contents of a ballot-box which has been in his custody.

We are called upon by the minority of the committee to have confidence in that box, although one of the commissioners at the box was found changing ballots after he received them from the hands of the voters, throwing upon the floor the votes received and substituting others. Doubtless he placed the box four feet from the window for the purpose of practicing that very fraud, the window being six feet from the ground where the voters could not see the ballot-box. The law of Louisiana provides that the ballot-box shall be placed in sight of the voter; and if he demands it he has the right to put the ballot in the box himself. Now I ask gentlemen here who are less than six feet high whether they can go up to a window placed at that height and see a ballot-box which is four feet from the window inside? Certainly not; it is contrary to common experience. These are the reasons why this poll should not be counted. The poll should be thrown out on account of the fraud of this man Jackson, together with other irregularities connected with it.

We now come to the poll number 2. W. W. Benham, one of the commissioners, swears that the returns were all made out, duly signed and sworn to, and returned to the proper officer. Montgomery, another commissioner, swears that he never signed any returns; he signed a poll-list but nothing else—no other paper. Yet, when we come to examine into the evidence and see what the State returning board had before them, we find that they had all the returns of all these precincts regularly signed and sworn to. They were forgeries, and forged, too, by this very man W. W. Benham. On page 76 of the evidence Mr. Dameron swears that the return which he signed was written in red ink, while the paper he saw before the State returning board was in black ink, and his name was a forgery. So swears Mr. Columbus, another commissioner. He says he never signed any such return. Mr. Jefferson swears that the return is a forgery. Mr. Yeager swears that a day or two after the election he saw W. C. Benham, a candidate for State senator, in a room with something before him on a table like tally-sheets and returns; that he had a pen and seemed to be writing. The door was locked. Ah, perhaps in that room these forgeries were committed. Yet these gentlemen would have you believe we are disfranchising these voters when everything is all right, asking us to put confidence in returns which every one of the witnesses, except Benham himself, swears were forged and entitled to no confidence whatever.

I come now to the testimony of Mr. Lackey, supervisor of registration for the parish of Carroll:

R. M. Lackey, sworn on the part of contestant, William B. Spencer, testifies as follows:

Question. Where do you reside? And were you or not supervisor of registration and election for the parish of Carroll for the election of November 2, 1874?

Answer. I reside in the parish of Carroll, and was the supervisor of registration, as stated.

Q. Were or not the election returns of the election held 2d November, 1874, for Carroll Parish, which were put before and promulgated by the State returning board made out and signed by you?

A. They were not made out and signed by me or by my authority.

Yet we are asked to put confidence in these returns. This is a colored man and a republican, but the frauds were so glaring that the witness would not stand them, and yet this House is asked to keep a member in his seat who claims his election upon such papers.

Again:

Q. Do you know that the returns which were before the returning board differed from the returns which you signed in respect to the votes for member of Congress?

(This question is objected to by contestant on the grounds that the returns themselves would be the best evidence of the matter inquired of.)

A. I know that they did differ.

This very man Benham is deputy clerk to this man Lackey, who is the county supervisor. He is the man who took the ballots out of the box and called out the names. When he is asked whether he called them correctly he says he did, and that Blount stood over him to see whether he called them correctly. When we turn to Blount's testimony we find that he did stand over him a little while and then went out of the room, paying no particular attention to what was going on. We are asked to put confidence in returns when we find this man Benham, who forged them, calling the names from the ballots for the tally-keepers, and those tally-keepers themselves not sworn. Here we find a man guilty of forgery calling names from the ballots, and then we find unsworn idlers and by-standers keeping the tally. I ask candidly whether confidence should be placed in papers coming from such men? I am stating the evidence just as it appears in the record, and there is no contradiction of it anywhere.

Again, these returns nowhere can be found in the clerk's office of the county. Where are they? Who spirited them away? Mr. Galbraith, the deputy clerk of the county, swears he was principal clerk and as such had in his charge the papers of the office. Then he is asked whether any such papers had been placed in his office. Here is his answer:

There have been none except a tally-sheet handed me by the commissioner of the first ward, which tally-sheet was afterward taken out of my office and carried away.

There is where R. K. Anderson got his tally-sheet. He is the man who stole that tally-sheet; he is the man who presented it when this evidence was being taken. It is found in his possession. He is the friend of the contestee and shown to be a strong partisan.

Great stress is laid on the vote at this poll, and that we should count it because the commissioners swear just what the vote is. Mr. Arroyo says that the affidavit filed by Bagley before the returning board showed clearly what the vote was for Congress. When we turn to the affidavit we find there is no vote for Congress in it. Mr. Arroyo says his recollection of that poll was there were 510 votes cast for Morey, but one of the commissioners says that there were 550 votes cast. The other commissioner is not sworn at all. There is a difference of 40 votes. It is taken from the memory of men six months after the election. We are called upon to seat this man upon such returns.

It is not worth while to discuss what the best testimony would have been here. That is not before us. We took what we have, and think that is not sufficient. It is entitled to no credit, no confidence whatever.

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman, I know, has no intention to misstate the record. He has stated that Mr. Arroyo in his protest gave his recollection so and so. Mr. Arroyo says in his protest that Bagley made an affidavit. Bagley was the democratic commissioner at this poll. Bagley in his affidavit says Morey got 510 votes, Spencer 7. That was a protest to impeach the correctness of the returns. If it was good for one purpose, it was good for all it contained. It showed the returns were incorrect, because they gave me 560, when he swears the true vote cast—and he was the democratic commissioner—was, Morey 510, Spencer 7. It was not a question of the recollection of Mr. Arroyo at all. Mr. Arroyo was the democratic member of the returning board who made this protest against the returns as they were made; and as a proof of the incorrectness of the returns, he introduces the affidavit of the democratic commissioner, who swears the returns were incorrect inasmuch as they showed the result was so and so, whereas the true result as sworn to was a different state of figures, and those figures, as sworn to by the democratic commissioner, elected me by 600 to 700 majority.

Mr. DE BOLT. Mr. Bagley does not anywhere give the number of votes. I will tell you what he does do, though. He says he never made that affidavit that Arroyo thinks he did. That is what he says.

Mr. MOREY. I would like to ask the gentleman to read a line or tittle where he says anything of the kind.

Mr. DE BOLT. I am speaking from the record, not from the recollection of gentlemen. I will read the affidavit as made by Bagley:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
Parish of Orleans:

R. M. Bagley, being sworn before the undersigned authority, declares that he is a citizen of Carroll Parish, and was a commissioner, and present as such at poll No. 3, in said parish at the election on 2d November, 1874, and that he compiled the returns of the vote of said poll, and signed the same; that, on November 28, 1874, he was present before the returning board, and personally examined the said return presented thereat from said poll by the State supervisor of registration, which affiant pronounced to be fraudulent in all and every particular, and the signature of affiant thereto is a forgery. Affiant further swears that the only official tally-sheet of said poll was made with red ink and signed by affiant in black ink, and the tally-sheet exhibited of said poll before said board was and is written in black ink, and therefore not the original tally-sheet, but fraudulent.

Further affiant saith not.

R. M. BAGLEY.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 28th day of November, 1874.

CHAS. A. BAQUIE.
Clerk Third District Court, Parish of Orleans.

That is the affidavit of Bagley.

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman said that Bagley states that he did not make the affidavit that I received 510 votes. In the affidavit just read he does not make that statement. It is not in the record.

Mr. HOUSE. If my colleague will allow me, Bagley states this: That he does not remember whether in making the affidavit before the State board at New Orleans he stated the number of votes or not.

Mr. MOREY. But he thinks he did.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not know whether he thinks he did; but he does not know whether he did or not. Arroyo says he made the affidavit. But there is no such affidavit of Bagley produced here at all; and the only evidence that Bagley ever made such an affidavit is that Arroyo says that he did. The affidavit is not produced in the record here at all, and consequently could not be in evidence for any one.

Mr. MOREY. Now, I will ask the gentleman if Arroyo's protest, on which is based the throwing out of this return by the returning board, does not recite that Bagley did make an affidavit and impeach the correctness of the returns by showing that the return was not in accordance with the facts, and that the fact was that I got 510 votes and Spencer got 7. Is not that recited in Arroyo's protest?

Mr. DE BOLT. Are you through?

Mr. MOREY. I am through.

Mr. DE BOLT. It is just what I said before precisely. I said that Arroyo in his protest stated that Bagley had made an affidavit in which he had stated that the votes were 510 for Morey.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DE BOLT. No, sir. I do not wish to be interrupted in my statement now. But Mr. Arroyo's statement is not evidence at all. It is altogether hearsay. The affidavit that he refers to is not produced anywhere; and the affidavit that is produced is one in which the number of votes cast does not appear, but which Bagley says is a forgery. Evidently Mr. Arroyo is mistaken about it. But whether he was or was not makes no difference here. They do not agree in their statement. Take his statement as true, 510 votes; and then take the statement of the other commissioner, 550 votes. Which are you to adopt?

Mr. MOREY. The other commissioner does not swear there were 550 votes. He swears that was his recollection. But Bagley makes a positive statement under oath, and he was the democratic commissioner, that my vote was 510 and Spencer's vote was 7, and that is corroborated by the other testimony.

Mr. DE BOLT. Will the gentleman turn to that testimony? I do not think he can. There is the record of the testimony. Let the gentleman show it to me. There is Bagley's testimony. He does not state it.

Mr. MOREY. I do not say that Bagley states it in his testimony. I say that Mr. Arroyo, who was a member of the returning board, recites the testimony of different parties, which went to impeach the correctness of these returns. He recites the affidavits and shows that the democratic commissioners when before the returning board impeached the returned vote by showing what the true vote was.

Mr. DE BOLT. I will repeat it again, and I think the gentleman will understand me this time. I say that Arroyo states that Bagley made an affidavit in which he stated the vote at 510 for Morey and 7 for Spencer. I admit that. But Bagley says he does not recollect making any such statement. That affidavit is not produced. It is only the recollection of Arroyo as to what Bagley had said. That is the whole of it. Then the other commissioner swears that the vote was 550. If Bagley says he recollects what the numbers were and gives them, I ask the gentleman to read his testimony to that effect.

Mr. MOREY. I did not say that he recollects the numbers, but he made an affidavit, and Arroyo in his official protest recites it. And here is what Bagley in cross-examination said on that point:

Question. Did you or not make affidavit, which affidavit was before the returning board, in which you stated the exact number of votes cast for W. B. Spencer and for Frank Morey for Congress, and which affidavit stated that this was the vote stated in the returns which you signed and swore to as being the correct statement of the votes cast for Morey and for Spencer, respectively, at poll No. 3?

(This question objected to by contestant.)

Answer. I know I made an affidavit before the returning board, and think, though I am not positive, that I stated therein the vote for Morey and Spencer. My statement in that affidavit, whatever it was, was correct.

Q. If in that affidavit you swore that William B. Spencer received 7 votes and Frank Morey 510, was or not that the correct statement of the votes cast for those persons?

(Contestant objects to this question.)

A. It was.

Now that is what he swears as to the affidavit. Arroyo, a democratic member of the returning board, stated in his protest that the vote in Carroll should not be counted, and brought in support of his protest the affidavits of the democratic commissioners at those polls in order to impeach the correctness of the return; and they swear that the official returns were not correct, because in those official returns it was shown that Morey received, say 600 votes for instance—I do not recollect the precise figure—whereas the true return was 510. Now those democratic commissioners of election who were called to impeach the correctness of the return impeached the correctness of the returns by showing what the true vote was. They swear positively what Spencer's vote was and what my vote was, and it left me, even on the affidavit of the democratic commissioners who knew the facts, 925 majority in the district. Now if those affidavits are good to prove the correctness of the returns, if they were good to show that I did not get 600 votes but only 500, they are good to prove the statement that I got 500 votes; and if that is not the correct principle of law, then the gentleman can correct me.

Mr. DE BOLT. But I know of no such affidavit that was before the returning board. Bagley swore that if he had made such an affidavit it was correct.

I will read his statement, which clearly shows uncertainty and doubt on his part in regard to that matter:

Question. On the return which you swore to as being the correct statement of votes cast at poll No. 3, how many votes were cast for William B. Spencer for Congress and Frank Morey for Congress?

(This question is objected to on grounds previously stated to other questions by contestant.)

Answer. I do not remember either now well enough to swear to them.

Q. Did you or not make affidavit, which affidavit was before the returning board, in which you stated the exact number of votes cast for W. B. Spencer and for Frank Morey for Congress, and which affidavit stated that this was the vote stated in the returns which you signed and swore to as being the correct statement of the votes cast for Morey and for Spencer, respectively, at poll No. 3?

(This question objected to by contestant.)

A. I know I made an affidavit before the returning board, and think, though I am not positive, that I stated therein the vote for Morey and Spencer. My statement in that affidavit, whatever it was, was correct.

Q. If in that affidavit you swore that William B. Spencer received 7 votes and Frank Morey 510, was or not that the correct statement of the votes cast for those persons?

(Contestant objects to this question.)

A. It was.

He says that he does not know that he made any such affidavit, but that if he did it was correct.

Mr. MOREY. The gentleman divides the sentences so as to give it a different interpretation. You can make a man swear anything if you divide his sentences in that way.

Mr. DE BOLT. I will read the whole of it.

Mr. MOREY. He says, I know I made an affidavit before the returning board, and I think, although I am not positive, that I gave the number of votes for Spencer and for Morey.

Mr. DE DOLT. He was not certain that he made an affidavit, but he says that if "I made an affidavit with those figures it was correct. I know I made an affidavit before that returning board." When that affidavit is read here, it is found to be dated the 28th of November, before the returning board, and there is not one statement in that affidavit in regard to the vote.

Mr. MOREY. He made two affidavits. Another witness called by the contestant, who was one of the contestant's counsel, also swore distinctly that Bagley and Spann, made affidavits that Arroyos, who was a member of the returning board, protested against counting the vote of Carroll Parish wards. He recites these affidavits. Do you stand up to impeach your own democratic member of the returning board in order to sustain your point? Mr. Bagley swore that the returns were correct, because he showed that I received 510 votes and I got only 500 votes.

Mr. DE BOLT. I say that the question depends on the recollection of Arroyo whether that affidavit was right or not.

The man who thought he made that affidavit does not know whether he made it or not. Where is it? Must we depend for the returns of an election upon the recollection of a man who bases his recollection upon what another man said? I say that there is not one particle of testimony showing anything else but the statement based on his recollection that the vote was 510 at that poll.

Mr. MOREY. It was the statement of a democrat.

Mr. DE BOLT. I care nothing about politics in a case of this kind. A republican can tell the truth as well as a democrat. It is nonsense to tell me that he is a democrat; it is nonsense and undignified to say that a witness is to be believed or disbelieved on account of his political views. I will not notice it further. I care nothing about their politics. I say this man Benham, who proved himself unworthy of belief, was a republican.

Mr. MOREY. He was not a republican; he was the democratic commissioner at that poll.

Mr. DE BOLT. I do not care what party he belongs to; but I believe he was a republican. You have been in this case from the beginning, and yet you do not understand it or know anything about it.

Now I repeat that this man Benham fails to recollect whether he made that affidavit or not, but he did say that if he made it it was correct.

Now, gentlemen, can we undertake to seat or unseat a member on such evidence? I will say further, that counting for the contestee the vote of Concordia Parish, the number of which I forget——

Mr. MOREY. Four hundred and ninety-eight.

Mr. DE BOLT. Counting those votes for the contestee and throwing out the votes of the first, second, and third polls of Carroll Parish, it elects the contestant by a majority of nearly 800.

Now, then, the gentleman from Mississippi dwelt somewhat at length upon the counting of the fourth and fifth wards in Carroll Parish. I could have saved him that trouble if he had listened to me at the time. They are small wards and their votes would not have changed the result; but I have no doubt that there were the same corruption and false returns as there were in the other wards of the parish if we had investigated them. But we found in the other wards fraud enough to seat Mr. Spencer and unseat the sitting member, and therefore we did not investigate those wards further.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have run through this subject hastily, and will not detain the House longer.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move that the House adjourn.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. OLIVER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House the papers in the claim of E. G. Everitt, no adverse report having been made in the case.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BURLEIGH for one week.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL KEARNEY.

Mr. HARDENBERGH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3570) granting condemned cannon for a monument to General Kearney; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JUDGE ANDREW WYLIE.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the select committee charged with the investigation in regard to Judge Wylie, of this District, to submit for adoption at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee to which was referred the memorials of Albert Grant be instructed to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Wylie, one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the District, and that that committee have authority to send for persons and papers and to examine witnesses under oath.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

ARMS ISSUED TO THE STATES.

Mr. BANNING. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back to this House the communication from the Secretary of War transmitting the draught of "A bill to provide for the proper accountability and care of the arms issued to the several States and Territories for the militia thereof," and to move that it be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

There being no objection, the motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD COMBINATIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas it is alleged that certain of the leading railroads engaged in interstate commerce and in commerce from the inland States to the seaboard for exportation have combined for the purpose of controlling said traffic, and have made and continue to make unjust discriminations in the carrying of such freight, whereby many industries have been crippled and are threatened with extreme prostration; and whereas numerous petitions have been presented during the present session of Congress praying for the passage of an act to regulate such commerce and to prohibit such discrimination: Now, therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised of the truth and extent of such alleged combination and of the effects thereof, and of the most complete remedy therefor,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to investigate the allegations aforesaid, and report by bill or otherwise, with power to send for persons and papers.

The motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 25, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection the order for trial session will be suspended temporarily for the purpose of receiving morning legislative business.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. C. C. SNIFFEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 24th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 199) for the relief of the estate of the late paymaster Major John S. Walker, United States Army; and

An act (S. No. 153) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the United States arsenal grounds near Benicia, California.

The message also announced that the President had this day signed the act (S. No. 293) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to cancel and annul the condemnation of ground in square 762, in the city of Washington, for a public alley, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial, signed by Mr. Elbridge G. Spaulding and many other leading citizens of Buffalo, New York, remonstrating against the proposed removal or abolition of the depository in Buffalo. I beg to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to this memorial, as it is signed by gentlemen whom he knows and in whom he confides, and their statement makes on me the impression that it is worthy of attention. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I have in my hand and beg leave to present a letter from the chief engineer in charge of the underground work of the Senate, discussing the question of the present Senate floor, and showing that, on account of some peculiarities of it, it tends to the injury of health resulting from bad ventilation, &c.; and accompanying the letter is a plan for an improvement in these respects. I move that this letter and the plan which I hold in my hand be referred, without printing, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON. I present the memorial of the Creek Nation of Indians, a delegation of which is now in the city of Washington, in relation to the funds due the Creek orphans under the treaty of 1832 and the act of March 3, 1837; and inasmuch as they have no representation upon the floor of the Senate, I ask that the memorial be read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, duly accredited representatives of the Creek Nation of Indians, respectfully beg leave to call the attention of your honorable body to the funds due certain individual members of the said Creek Nation known as the "Creek orphans."

The history and merits of this matter are fully set forth and discussed in Executive Document No. 246, Forty-third Congress, second session, heretofore filed before your honorable body, copies of which are herewith transmitted. By reference to the documents or official data alluded to, the claim of the said Creek orphans will be found to be an individual instead of a national character, and to consist chiefly of the following items, and originally due under treaty stipulations:

1. The sum of $74,300 to re-imburse the said orphans in the value of certain depreciated bonds purchased by your Government in contravention to law with moneys (gold) belonging to said orphans.

2. The sum of $63,956.29 to re-imburse said orphans in that amount (gold) taken from them without authority of law and applied to general purposes of the Creek Nation.

3. The sum of $106,799.68 to re-imburse said orphans in that amount, (gold,) which was taken from them by your Government without authority of law and applied to the support of loyal refugees of the Creek Nation, aggregating the sum of $251,055.97.

A list of the names of these claimants is registered in the Interior Department, and the funds claimed are in no sense a gratuity from your Government, because they embrace an unpaid remainder that originated under your treaty of 24th March, 1832, with the Creek Nation, and are of the proceeds of the lands owned by the orphans and allowed them as their just proportion of lands owned and set apart in the same treaty to the rest of the Creek people, in proportion to their numbers. The claimants being, at the time of investiture of their rights to these lands, minor orphans, the treaty referred to made the President of the United States their guardian and custodian, and as such guardian, he, the President, at his discretion, being authorized by said treaty, ordered the sale of the lands for the benefit of the said orphans, under the provision of an act of Congress of March 3, 1837, (see United States Statutes, volume 5, page 186,) and their proceeds were invested in stocks. This act authorized the interest on these funds to be paid to the claimants, in such amount and in such a manner as in the opinion of the President would be most advantageous to them, and the principal of the funds to be also paid whenever the President may think proper. Out of this original fund of the claimants the President has ordered two payments, which have been made; one of August 26, 1868, for $106,434.12, and the other of July 1, 1870, for $24,291.03, leaving a remainder yet due and unpaid of $251,055.97, as stated above. Your treaty of 1866 with the Creek Nation re-affirmed this claim, and your honorable body, by acts of appropriation of 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875, appropriating the interest on said fund, have acknowledged it. The claimants, as individuals, have receipted your Government for the accrued interest on these funds as well as the principal already paid. Several of the original orphans are dead, and their heirs inherit their rights; and those who still survive are now generally feeble with age, some of them having grandchildren; and by the late war have been reduced to abject poverty and distress, and greatly need what is due them.

In view of these facts the undersigned, in behalf of said Creek orphans, respectfully solicit your honorable body to enact such legislation as will authorize and direct the issuance of United States 5 per cent. bonds in place of the $74,300 of the depreciated bonds alluded to, and providing that the United States Government take these depreciated bonds as its own property; and, further, that your honorable body make the necessary appropriation either in money or United States 5 per cent. bonds to cover the sum of $69,956.29 of said Creek orphans, misapplied by the Government for general purposes of the Creek Nation; also, the sum of $106,799.68, misapplied by the Government for the support of loyal refugees of the Creek Nation, so that the same may be applied by the President for the benefit of the claimants, as provided by the said act of Congress of March 3, 1837.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

D. N. McINTOSH,
PLEASANT PORTER,
D. M. RODGE,
Creek Delegates.

MAY 24, 1876.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the memorial be printed, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present additional papers and documents, in the nature of testimony, in favor of the bill (S. No. 716) to authorize the execution of a resolution of the national council of the Osage Indians, which has been reported to the Senate adversely and placed upon the Calendar. In order that the bill may receive consideration in the light of this testimony, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs with the testimony now offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Melissa E Banks praying to have her name restored to the pension-rolls as the widow of Ezekiel Banks, late a Federal officer in the war of 1861, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 552) to restore the franking privilege, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Lucinda H. Lyon, praying to be allowed arrears of pension on account of the loss of her son, late of Company A, Seventy-seventh Regiment New York Volunteers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2698) granting a pension to Mary Desbrow, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2300) granting a pension to Margaret C. Bell, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Merritt Lewis, late of Company K, Seventh Michigan Cavalry, praying an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 535) granting a pension to Armstead Goodlow, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2849) for the relief of William Rule, postmaster at Knoxville, Tennessee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

JACKSON T. SORRELLS.

Mr. KEY. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 755) for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back without amendment. It is a very small bill, and the Post-Office Department recommend that the amount named in it be paid. If no Senator objects, I should like to have the bill passed at once.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the report be read in that case, and I think no Senator will object to the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, this day submitted by KEY from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells, (H. R. No. 755,) having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report:

That during the year 1865, and before the postal service of the United States had been completely re-established in the State of North Carolina, Mr. Sorrells was employed by an agent of the Post-Office Department, of competent authority for the purpose, to carry the mails once a week each way between Asheville and Franklin, in the State of North Carolina. He was to receive compensation at the rate of eight cents per mile, counting the distance one way between the two points, which distance was seventy-two miles. Mr. Sorrells carried the mail under this contract during the months of November and December, 1865, for which he has received no compensation. It appears that the unsettled condition of the country in which this service was rendered and the complications growing out of the restoration of Federal authority and institutions over it led to such difficulty and delay that claimant's demand for compensation was not presented in time for payment out of the postal appropriation bill for the year 1865, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General reports that "the Department can see no objection to the payment of Mr. Sorrells for said service."

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jackson T. Sorrells $53.80 for carrying the United States mails in the year 1865 between Asheville and Franklin, North Carolina.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment have had under consideration the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States, together with the veto message of the President, and, after considering the bill and the veto message, I am instructed by the committee to report the bill back, and recommend its passage, notwithstanding the veto message, and I say now that I am instructed by the committee also to ask the attention of the Senate to this bill, and I shall press its consideration at the very earliest day I can get the floor.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DENNIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 866) to remove the political disabilities of Dr. Thomas H. Williams, of Maryland; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Leggett, late supernumerary second lieutenant of the Fifth Michigan Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 869) to confer certain jurisdiction on the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

REMISSION OF REVENUE TAXES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to call up a House bill that will take but a moment. It has been pending some time and requires immediate action. It will lead to no debate and cause no delay. It is a small matter, but of pressing importance, reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the subject?

Mr. BOGY. It is a bill for the relief of certain parties who were engaged in making vinegar in the city of Saint Louis. It was thought by the revenue officers that the product of their factory was in conflict with the revenue law; but they made this vinegar under the authority of the collector of internal revenue there; and it is a matter of doubt whether they are or are not liable to the payment of the tax. A bill has passed the House which leaves the matter for investigation by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It has met the approbation of the Committee on Finance unanimously. In the mean time these men, who have very large establishments in Saint

Louis and elsewhere, have been stopped and are now stopped from doing their work, which is very important, not only to them but to the community. The case has been very thoroughly investigated and it is thought by the Commissioner that these men did not violate the law, but there is some little obscurity about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the State of Missouri is deprived of that most useful beverage, vinegar, I certainly cannot stand in the way of the bill being taken up; and I withdraw my call for the regular order for the time being.

Mr. BOGY. I move to take up House bill No. 1800.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis; Kuner, Zisemann & Zott; Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri; and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to remit internal-revenue taxes upon low wines produced in the manufacture of vinegar, namely, $9,792, assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on the 21st day of September, 1875, against Crawford M. Kendrick and William H. Avis, doing business at Saint Louis under the firm-name and style of Kendrick & Avis, and entered upon the August list of that year for the first district of Missouri; $2,007 assessed by the Commissioner on the 2d of August, 1875, against Max Kuner, John F. Zisemann, and Armin Zott, doing business at Saint Louis under the firm-name and style of Kuner, Zisemann & Zott, and entered upon the June list of that year for that district; $2,135, assessed by the Commissioner on the 2d of August, against Max Kuner and Armin Zott, former partners in business at Saint Louis, under the firm-name and style of Kuner & Zott, and entered upon the list last mentioned; and $806.40, assessed by the Commissioner on the 27th day of December, 1875, against C. Nachtrieb, J. F. Nachtrieb, C. E. Kopp, and F. A. Burch, doing business at Galion, in the ninth district of Ohio, under the firm-name and style of Nachtrieb & Co., and entered upon the November list of that year.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 4 after the word "remit" to insert "so much of;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remit so much of the following internal-revenue taxes upon low wines, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill:

As, in his opinion, justice and equity may require: Provided, He shall be satisfied that the parties named are entirely free from any intention to violate the internal-revenue laws in the manufacture of vinegar as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to state that this case was very carefully examined by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who is familiar with the business of the Internal Revenue Office, and the bill is based on a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who presents about this state of facts: These men were engaged in the manufacture of vinegar as a trade or business in different parts of the western country; and in the process of manufacture they used a new invention, which enabled them in a kind of distillation to employ certain properties extracted from grain, very much as in the process of distilling. The question whether this was a violation of law was submitted to the Internal Revenue Office and decided, in the first place, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in favor of their right to use this article. These parties were notified of that fact, and were encouraged to go on by the local officers in different places; but afterward, on more careful examination, the Department decided that this process was in violation of law, as I think it was, though without any intention to evade the law; but the effect of it was to evade the law and save these people from using tax-paid spirits. They were therefore compelled to discontinue the process, and these assessments were made upon them. It is very clear that if the taxes were collected it would not only ruin them but do them a great injustice, because it appears very plainly from the papers that they were led to believe that the process was not in violation of law.

I believe that is the substance of the case. The Senator from Massachusetts knows more about it than I do. The committee thought, on the whole, that it was fair to provide that if the Commissioner should decide, on full examination, that there was no intent on the part of these persons to evade the law, they might have the benefit of the remission of the taxes already accrued.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Vermont will allow me, I hope, to report the bill (H. R. No. 3479) making certain transfers of appropriations in the provisions for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice for the current year from the Committee on Appropriations. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill without amendment. It is a bill that the Department of Justice thinks ought to pass. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will look at that, and take it up by and by, if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to order, legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed——

Mr. DAVIS. I think the bill had better be sent back to me, and I will report it to-morrow morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be passed by and by. There is no need to send it back.

Mr. DAVIS. I withdraw the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to order, legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are hereby instructed to inquire whether any, and if any what, provision should be made for the widow of John King, who was killed by the explosion of gas that occurred in the Capitol on the 19th instant, and for L. B. Cutler, who was severely burnt and injured by said explosion, and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened; and

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 25, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., the Speaker in the chair. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order this morning is the unfinished business coming over from yesterday, being the contested-election case of Spencer vs. Morey.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the unfinished business be postponed for two hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would inquire for what purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. To enable the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to move that the House resolve itself in Committee of the Whole upon the tariff bill.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to yield to me to make a report from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. MORRISON. I will do so, if it does not take much time.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. COX. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back to the House the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes, with sundry amendments of the Senate thereto, and to move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in.

There being no objection, the report was received, and the amendments of the Senate to said bill were non-concurred in.

Mr. COX. I now move that a committee of conference be requested upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman from Illinois submits his motion to go into Committee of the Whole, I would ask him to allow me to offer a resolution which is the result of a consultation with several members of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRISON. I would prefer not to do so just at this time. I will move in two hours that the committee rise.

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

TARIFF.

Mr. MORRISON. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 3132) to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and to reduce taxation.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and reduce taxation.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the responsibility taken upon myself in the introduction of a bill to simplify, revise, and reduce the duties on imports. With some modifications, it has received the approval of the Committee of Ways and Means, and is now before the House for consideration. Should the bill become a law, as I trust it may, it will necessarily affect the trade, commerce, and industry of the entire country, and affect them, it is believed, all for good.

A measure of such magnitude ought to receive the most earnest and thoughtful consideration. This I have given it, not omitting to avail myself of the research of others or to accept any suggestions pointing to the correction of abuses resulting from existing laws or the manner of their enforcement.

Taxation by tariffs and duties on imported goods compels contribution to the support of the Government through the wants and necessities of life. And, as if distrusting the justice of its demands, it operates by indirection and too often does its oppressive work in violation of the most righteous law of equality. However unequal and unjust these taxes are they must be paid, because we must have the comforts and necessaries of life upon which they are levied. Cold, hunger, and thirst gather them in.

Though impracticable now to resort to it, that system is best, because most equal, which takes from the tax-payer his due proportion in the most direct manner. Burdens of Government should be borne in proportion to ability to bear them. Property should pay the taxes. He who has much should pay much; he who has little should pay little; and he who has none, none.

Conceding the right of labor to its earnings and the right of property, it is difficult to see how the freedom of exchange of either, how the right of the citizen to buy, sell, and exchange may be interfered with and taxed in the interest of and for the protection of other citizens or favored classes of citizens.

Protection, therefore, other than that incidental to revenue, is spoliation, because it takes the earnings of the labor of one person or class of persons and gives these earnings to other persons or more favored classes; protection which would take equally and bestow equally would be no protection at all; its abolition would be of most easy accomplishment, having no selfish interests for its maintenance.

TARIFFS OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

The advocates of protection allege that all nations which have become skillful in manufactures have become so by means of protection. The facts do not warrant the assertion. The system has either resulted in loss of prosperity, in the gravest injury, sometimes utter ruin, or it has been given up as a failure, as it was in Great Britain, where it was applied under the most favorable circumstances. In 1840, after many years of peace and several successive abundant harvests, its advocates were made to admit its failure, and a little later the remedy was applied and continued by the successive adoption of free-trade measures.

Two hundred years ago a great London merchant—Sir Josiah Child—in assigning reasons for the permanent prosperity of the Netherlands said:

> The prodigious increase of the Netherlands in their domestic and foreign trade, riches, and multitude of shipping is the envy of the present and may be the wonder of future generations. * * * Some of the means by which they have advanced their trade and improved their estates are the following: Their giving great encouragement and immunities to inventors of new manufactures and the discoverers of new mysteries of trade, and to those who shall bring the commodities of other countries first in use and practice among them, * * * the lowness of their customs and the height of their excise, which latter is certainly the most equal tax in the world and the least prejudicial to any people.

The navigation acts of Great Britain were enacted in the time of Cromwell, because the free ships and free goods of the Dutch covered every ocean, led to the prosperity of their owners, and aroused the jealousy of England. When England had enjoyed her navigation acts for nearly half a century and her protective policy longer, had made two great wars to destroy Dutch commerce, and the flag of the Netherlands still covered every sea, Sir Josiah Child, in his second edition in 1692, gave a list of trades lost to England, covering the principal commercial seas and marts of the world. (1)*

Thus freedom prospered and the protected shipping of England languished; but the Netherlands became the battle-ground of Europe, while England's insular position saved her where her protective laws could not, and in the next century she gained in spite of her protective laws, not by means of them.

The Dutch, through long years of trial and of battle, maintained the freedom of their commerce, and somebody wrote of them "that, producing not a grain of wheat, they yet eat the whitest bread of Europe;" but at last, having exhausted every means of internal taxation, they were forced to have recourse to a tariff, and from that day their prosperity declined. And now, again relieved from danger, Belgium prospers once more under a system of nearly absolute free trade.

For many centuries the republics of Italy prospered with the freedom of their commerce. More than four hundred years ago Florence alone had two hundred woolen factories, employing 30,000 workmen, producing 80,000 pieces of cloth. The fleets of Venice visited every sea and port of Europe and Northern Africa.

Blanqui's History of Political Economy tells of this commercial greatness and its fall, and how its decay began with the establishment of protection.

The Italian republics were destroyed by a war of duties.

Switzerland, free among her mountains, sustains her industries and manufactures with not so much protection as a patent law, and contests with England and France for supremacy in the fineness and beauty of her cotton fabrics, coming to us for raw material.

But the most singular perversion of history is the frequent assertion that England established her manufactures by means of protection and only modified her system when prosperity was assured. Why, Mr. Chairman, she was forced to change by adversity. Hume, Huskinson, Villiers, Thompson, and many of the most intelligent men in England struggled for the removal of restrictions, when at last their opponents gave way.

Very early in the history of free-trade legislation a member of Parliament made this apt and terse statement concerning this question:

> In the commercial and fiscal policy of a nation lies the foundation of the happiness, the prosperity, and the welfare not only of the working classes but of the capitalist also.

Not a hundred years ago it required a life-time to understand the customs laws of Great Britain, they were so numerous; yet six hundred more were passed between 1797 and 1815. When George III came to the throne there were eight hundred acts in force; thirteen hundred were passed during the fifty-three years of his reign. They even outdid us in their number and complications. As with us, they grew up under a pretext of war and by other devices all selfish and for private interests at the public expense. In 1840 the protective system reached the climax of absurdity.

It was then it appeared on examination by a committee on import duties that—

17 articles produced	£21,700,630
29 articles produced	898,651
144 articles produced	363,3:3
531 articles produced	80,000

while upon 147 an excess of drawback was allowed for various purposes and reasons.

This investigation proved that the branches of industry most protected were most subject to disastrous fluctuations. What was true of Great Britain in 1840 is true of us to-day, because like causes produce like effects. Our cotton, wool, and iron manufactuers, so highly protected, are greatly depressed.

In England, in 1840, the ministry presented to Parliament a deficiency of $12,000,000; but the time had arrived when the truth had forced its way to the minds of all that the reduction of the rate and burden of taxation increases revenue, and the attempt of the ministry to supply the deficiency by increased customs and excise tax failed. It was in the next year that Sir Robert Peel described the chancellor of the exchequer "seated on an empty chest by the pool of a bottomless deficiency fishing for a budget," yet he (Peel) was unconverted.

The condition of the country given by Noble in his History of the Fiscal Legislation of Great Britain, confirmed by both radical and tory authority, was most dismal. Having given a statement of imports and exports, he said:

> It is, however, utterly impossible to convey by mere statistics of our exports an adequate picture of the condition of the nation. Sir Robert Peel took office in 1841. Every interest in the country was alike depressed in the manufacturing districts. Mills and workshops were closed, and property daily depreciated in value; in the seaports shipping was laid up useless in the harbor; agricultural laborers were eking out a miserable existence upon starvation wages and parochial relief; the revenue was insufficient to meet the national expenditure; the country was brought to the verge of national and universal bankruptcy. * * * The protective system, which was supported with the view of rendering the country independent of foreign sources of supply, and thus it was hoped fostering the growth of home trade, had most effectually destroyed that trade by reducing the entire population to beggary, destitution, and want. The masses of the people were unable to procure food, and had consequently nothing to spend upon British manufactures.

To the condition thus pictured protection had brought Great Britain, yet every step in the reform and removal of duties was resisted as it is here, every device that selfish, ignorant greed could suggest was resorted to that the course of reform might be staid. They failed then as they will fail now; the remedy was applied, and England regained prosperity.

During a quarter of a century the struggle went on, hastened a little perhaps by the Irish famine, and not impeded by the war with China; each removal of protective duties was followed by increased prosperity, until the only articles taxed in the custom-house are tea, coffee, spirits, wines, and tobacco, and a few articles, like chiccory, used as substitutes for some of these. All protection disappeared; all opponents of liberal policy admit that they have been benefited in spite of themselves.

They began, as we do, with a small addition to the free list and a small reduction of rates, imposing for the first time in time of peace an income tax to meet a deficiency in revenue which never came; revenue increased with each reduction of rates, and at last the chapter closes in these words by Noble in his History of Fiscal Legislation:

It has been shown upon unquestionable evidence that the policy of free trade which it was confidently predicted would ruin agriculture, annihilate rent, destroy manufactures, pauperize labor, and render impossible the collection of the national revenue, has rendered agriculture prosperous, largely augmented rent, vastly extended manufactures and employment, increased the wages of labor; and while securing the collection of an increased revenue, has by improving the value of property lessened the burden of taxation.

Look at the beginning—see the end. In 1840 prostration, vice, and misery, caused by the protective system. In 1860 prosperity everywhere in all branches of industry, crime and pauperism decreased, and manufactures established on the most firm basis. Is our present condition similar to that of Great Britain in 1840 or in 1860? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Judge KELLEY) may tell us. Is the picture of Great Britain in 1840 at all familiar? This is the picture of Great Britain protected as we now are. The iron-masters summoned by him to protest against any modification of our war tariff described themselves as: "Either in the hands of the sheriff or selling iron below cost," and "wages of iron-workers so low that they and their families can scarce escape destitution and starvation." If this be true, is it not well to consider if protection in its effects does not, like history, repeat itself?

England at the beginning of tariff reforms in 1840 levied duties on twelve hundred articles, we now on four thousand nearly.

An increase on luxuries even will enrich only the smugglers. Crooked whisky tells us that excessive excise taxes make knaves and thieves. Which way, then, shall we lay our course? We must try the removal of restrictions, take off the shackles, and get revenue from property which represents the results of labor, not from processes or means by which it is acquired. We must recognize the oft-repeated truth that where protection begins revenue ends.

Bad as the system of protection is believed to be, it must be dealt with by no abrupt change or headlong speed, but with sure and moderate steps, with the care and caution of enlightened statesmanship.

AMERICAN TARIFFS.

The present tariff serves neither the purpose of revenue nor protection. It is condemned by the Treasury because it promotes fraud and offers a premium to unfaithful officers; the manufacturer of woolens satisfied with enormous rates of duty on woolen goods complains of high duties on raw wool, chemicals, and dye-stuffs; the hardware manufacturer, content with the rates of protection on his wares, complains of the high duties on steel and iron; even the manufacturer of cottons complains of the increased cost of producing his fabrics by reason of high duties on dyes and colors. Revenue is a mere incidental or secondary matter; the interests of the toiling, working, and producing millions are ignored, and we have as the outgrowth of our tariff a selfishness which in its race for subsidies and bounties has clouded some of our best intellects and dwarfed the spirit of laudable enterprise.

The well-known compromise tariff of 1833 fixed a rate on goods paying duties averaging 31 per cent. When the then opposition or whig party had attained power, August 30, 1842, these duties were made mostly specific and increased to 34, an advance in the rate of only 10 per cent. Some industries, chiefly iron, cotton, and woolen goods, were greatly favored, and after four years this tariff was modified by the celebrated "Walker tariff" of August 1, 1846.

This was very justly styled a revenue tariff, and was in force eleven years up to March 3, 1857. The average rate on dutiable articles was during the eleven years' existence of this tariff 23¼ per cent., about 33 per cent. below that which gave place to it. Perhaps no tariff has had a more intelligent simplicity or a nicer sense of justice. It implied perfect faith in the integrity of the officers of the Government and their ability to collect the revenue levied in this fairest of all forms, on the basis of values. After thirty additional years of experience and education in the science of government this most equitable feature of a system at best unequal must be virtually abandoned, lest we shall be robbed by the collusion of officers chosen to protect and guard the revenue. The remedy proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury "is the substitution so far as practicable of specific for ad valorem duties." And so it is we are driven to the collection of duties in the specific form, while the inequalities of the system itself are mostly mitigated by the ad valorem principle of the Walker tariff. Another principle of this well-considered measure was its classification of duties, by which the duties which averaged 23¼ per cent. were placed as low as 5 per cent. or made free on some articles of necessity and raw materials which enter into the reproduction of other articles, while luxuries, like wines and spirits, were taxed as high as 40 to 100 per cent. This was the basis or principle of chief popularity of this very just and practical financial measure. (II.)

The effect of this measure upon the country after a few years' duration was significant.

The revenue under the tariff of 1842 for the fiscal year 1845, when the rate of duty was 32¼ per cent., was $30,952,416. Three years later, in 1848, under the "Walker tariff," when the duty was 24 per cent. on dutiable goods, a decrease of 25 per cent. in rate of duty, the revenue rose to $31,757,071, and continued to rise until 1856, when it was $64,022,863, the average duty then being only 25 per cent. And however remarkable it may appear now, this country was then on the highway to free trade when even England was halting.

The tariff of 1846 gave place to that of 1857, which, recognizing the same equitable principle and based upon a sound political economy, reduced the average of rates from 23¼ to 19 per cent., and at this low rate the revenue of 1860 was $53,187,571. (III.) To encourage protectionists and to quiet their alarm lest a lower tariff may further increase the balance of trade against us, it may be well to call attention to the fact that in that year (1860) of low duties of 19 per cent. the importations were ninety-one cents less to the person than in 1875. We have alarmists who believe, or in the interest of bounties and subsidies pretend to believe, that our people require guardians lest they will buy themselves, and the nation as well, into bankruptcy if allowed cheap clothing and cheap necessaries of life. Let them take courage in the fact that in 1860, with the low tariff of 19 per cent., the apprehension was not justified; they actually bought less to the person than in the last year. Yet Mr. MORRILL, author of the Morrill tariff, said of the year 1860:

And that was a year of as large production and as much general prosperity as any perhaps in our history.

In the effort to relieve the people from taxation by the low tariff of 1857 the rates were fixed below the demands of the Government for revenue, but the statistics show that with low duties we had more dutiable and less free goods; proportionally more revenue with less importations. (IV.)

The tariff of 1857 in its turn gave place to that of March 2, 1861, and since then we have had nearly annual changes, and sometimes three changes in the same year, each giving new bounties to monopolists with new burdens for the people.

The act of March 2, 1861, known as the "Morrill tariff," was the first of a series of tariffs unequaled in their iniquitous complications, hardships, and monstrous duties. Enacted as war measures, and pretendedly for a temporary purpose, they have been until now maintained because it was alleged that with them and through them the country was prosperous. Now it is insisted they shall be maintained because it is not so.

For the first time in our tariff legislation, the Morrill tariff imposed two duties on the same article, one specific, the other ad valorem, or on the basis of value. It would be matter of curiosity rather than profit, perhaps, to see with what modesty the author applied the principle (or want of principle) of double duties to only fifteen articles. (V.)

This was only an entering-wedge, opening the way for the greater confusion and complications under which the system now groans, for this tariff in its turn gave place to that which followed five months later, August 5, 1861. By this tariff tea and coffee were added to the list of articles paying duties and the duty upon other articles was increased. And on the 24th of December of the same year the tax upon tea, coffee, and sugar was again increased.

There was another general increase in tariff rates on July 14, 1862. The general average of rates on goods paying duties, which under the Morrill tariff rose from 19 to 26.7 per cent., speedily rose to 33.2 per cent. under the tariff of 1862, while the double duties multiplied in number and increased in rates. The rasp and file makers, lest their wares might rust, came in for a double duty on files and rasps. Woolen goods—too cheap, in the opinion of the then law-makers, for the men in arms—were raised and doubled up. (VI.) But it was on June 30, 1864, that the real tariff saturnalia set in. The average rate of duties on dutiable imports, which in 1863 was 33 per cent., was so increased in 1865-'66 the rate rose to the enormous average of 47 per cent. on dutiable imports. Double duties were multiplied and were increased.

And how was this enormous taxation obtained; under what pretext and under what condition of alarm and apprehension did the people of the country receive and accept this new burden of taxation? Let Mr. MORRILL, who had the bill in charge, answer. On the 2d of June, 1864, he said:

I estimate that the present bill will increase the revenue not less than $15,000,000, and probably more; this is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and it is needful that it should pass speedily.

The war ended eleven years ago, but this "war measure," this "temporary measure" is not only in full operation, but its effects have in fact been aggravated by laying new and increased rates of duty as some of the victories of peace. While these remain, the advocates of protection may well proclaim that "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war."

Amid the clash of arms it would doubtless have been deemed unpatriotic to question the fact that these tariff laws were enacted as "war" measures and "temporary" measures; but when we see them maintained and multiplied, with peace at home and abroad, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that selfish greed had much to do with their enactment and no less with their maintenance.

The internal-revenue tax, too, was made to furnish an additional pretext for new burdens on the people and increased bounties to the protected.

Mr. MORRILL further said:

In adjusting the tariff upon iron the principle has been to give an increase upon the tariff of 1861 equal to the internal-revenue duties

If this was ever true why were these duties not re-adjusted with the repeal of internal-revenue taxes in 1869? It was not done then, nor has it been since. Why not do it now that the reason, so far as it had reason or pretext, no longer exists?

The next tariff change in 1865 gave a little more protection; and in 1866 there were three tariff acts passed, among them one laying a tax of 20 per cent. on cattle, horses, and mules. This for agriculture!

The tariff act of 1867 was simply an agreement between the wool-growers and woolen manufacturers, ratified by Congress, to increase the duty on foreign wool and woolen fabrics.

Of course, as is usual in class legislation and tariff jugglery, neither the consumer nor the Treasury was supposed to have any interest in the matter. All that was required of the consumer was to pay his tax and hold his peace.

This alliance and increase had no pretext in war, but added from 30 to 60 per cent. to existing rates, and, as events have proved, was a misfortune to both interests. Woolen manufactures languish, with wages lower than before the war, while the wool-growers receive less for their wool this very year than they did under the tariff of 1857. (VII.)

The next important amendment of the tariff, in July 14, 1870, was a modification and reduction. But cotton goods, wool and woolen fabrics, iron manufactures, in fact all manufactured articles, with one or two minor exceptions, remained untouched.

The Treasury then overflowing with $100,000,000 surplus, the spirit of rapacity never abated. The pretext of war was gone, but protection emboldened by success demanded and obtained new tribute from hemp, oils, marble, grindstones, and nickel. Certainly no one will contend these new duties, with a Treasury surplus, were for any other purpose than to tax the people for the benefit of those engaged in the nickel, oil, and grindstones business. (VIII.)

In 1872 the duty on tea and coffee was removed. Nor can there be the slightest doubt that this tax as well as numerous internal-revenue taxes were taken off that a better pretext for protection on manufactures of all kinds should remain. It is greatly to be regretted that many fair-minded revenue reformers, who under other financial conditions of the Government would be free-traders, fell into this trap.

It has proved a stumbling-block to revenue and tariff reform, and is accomplishing what it was intended it should accomplish. No tariff tax is more easily collected or more fairly distributed, and it is lamentable that men otherwise of great attainments will not believe the people capable of understanding these truths.

A duty of 3 cents per pound on coffee and 15 on tea would yield us ten millions on each, and would be a tax on each of 21¼ cents to the person. Forty-three cents tax to the person upon these articles would yield $20,000,000 revenue. Where can we obtain so much revenue from customs at so little cost? Not from duty upon manufactures, for these are protected at a rate exceeding 40 per cent. To obtain twenty millions in duties from manufactures we protect, at the cost of the consumer, the home product of five times greater value which yields no revenue.

By laying duties all of which go into the Treasury on tea and coffee, articles not produced here, we can remove duties on manufactures which cost us from $2 to $5 to put one in the Treasury. Somebody said you would tax "the tea and coffee of the poor."

Why, Mr. Chairman, all tariff taxes are paid by the multitude, not by the few who own the property. This is the wrong and injustice of the system. And shall the multitude pay on the tea and coffee twenty millions directly into the Treasury or a hundred millions on their hats, blankets, shoes, axes, hoes, medicines, quinine, spool-thread, and needles to put twenty millions in the Treasury and eighty millions in the pockets of the manufacturers? We are now paying nearly 3 cents per pound duty on sugar, or a tax of 75 cents to the person, annually, and while doing this we are protecting and increasing the prices of sugar made here, putting money into the pockets of the planters as well as the Treasury. (IX.)

The same year, in June, 1872, the (horizontal) reduction of 10 per cent. on manufactures was enacted. This reduction was injurious to the revenue and illogical in effect; it reduced the duty on bunting from 112 to 108 per cent., on spool-thread from 76 to 69 per cent., with other like absurd reductions; it was repealed a year ago, but not without adding a little more protection for manufacturers of silk and cotton mixed goods. This is in brief our tariff history for thirty years last past.

SHOULD OUR TARIFF BE MODIFIED?

The industry, trade, and commerce of the country should not be disturbed wantonly or upon any trivial pretext; the proposed modification can affect them beneficially only, and is a necessity demanded alike by the needs of the Treasury and the consumer. This necessity is best expressed by facts and figures of existing rates of duty taken from official sources. They are reduced to rates on the basis of value, though often laid in specific or double form. On printed calico we pay a duty of 71, on blankets an average of 78, on spool-thread 74, on woolen cloth 68, and on very many articles of chief use among the industrial and producing classes from 50 to 100 per cent., and this brief statement illustrates the exactions of the present tariff. (X.) Now, should such a tariff exist? How little is really known of the meaning of 60, 70, or 100 per cent. duties. Take, for example, the common print on which we levy 71 per cent. duty; if the Government levied its duties, as once the church did, in the form of tithes, and instead of making consumers pay in money for duties the Treasury would buy goods, what would be the result? The good wife going into a store to buy 15 yards of calico for a dress would have to buy exactly 25.65 yards, and the division would be 15 yards for her own dress and 10.65 yards for the Treasury. This is the meaning of a 71 per cent. duty.

Suppose a man required 200 feet of marble, he would buy 418 feet, out of which he might retain 200 feet and the Treasury get 218 feet. This is the meaning of 109 per cent. duty.

Suppose our patriotism at this centennial shall rise to the intensity of requiring for every home a flag made of 10 yards of bunting; we must buy each 21.7 yards of bunting, 11.7 yards of which we must render in a tax to this good Government of equal laws as an earnest of patriotism displayed by the other 10 yards flaunting in the breeze.

Take for further illustration the article of blankets. In 1870 we produced 2,000,439 pair, having an average weight of five pounds per pair, in all 10,002,195 pounds. Certainly we did not produce less than that quantity in 1875. Now turn to the imports of blankets. In 1875 we imported 9,992 pounds. The foreign value was $10,875.60; the duty collected thereon was $8,451.22, or an average of 78 per cent. Then we have protected over 10,000,000 pounds home-made blankets at an average rate of 78 per cent., and imported 9,992 pounds and got an incidental revenue of $8,451.

What does this protection of 10,000,000 pounds of blankets cost the people? Every pound of blanket is, at its very lowest calculation, made dearer in average fifty cents. Then the people are taxed $5,000,000 annually on their blankets, and the Treasury gets an incidental revenue of $8,451. I shall no doubt hear that blankets are now as cheap as they were before the war, and if the duty was off would be dearer than with the duty on. The real fact is that a pound of blankets costing in England fifty-three cents gold cannot be bought for less than $1.10 to $1.25 in New York.

It is true that we protect the blanket interest of this country. But suppose a proposition was made in this House to subsidize the blanket manufacturers and give them $5,000,000 annually, how would such a proposition be received? The result and operation of our tariff amount to the same thing, only that the subsidy is covered up in the shape of duties. The people are taxed all the same and have to pay it. What is true of this is true of almost every highly protected article. These illustrations but show that our tariff has for its object protection of the so-called home industries; any revenue derived from the highly taxed foreign commodities is incidental only. If members will but consider the enormous cost of this system of protection, the result of their consideration will be appalling. An examination as to quantities of cotton and woolen goods, iron, steel, and lead, and their manufactures, which we consume, and the average rate of duties on these articles will show that we consume about $900,000,000 in value of them, and, estimating increased price resulting from protection, if increased to the full extent of the rate of duty, will find it about $377,000,000, of which the Government gets $47,000,000, while $330,000,000 go in bounties to the protected. (XI.) In this connection, too, let it be remembered that our manufactures, all of which are highly protected, including those just enumerated, amount to more than $4,000,000,000. And this vast quantity—less about 2 per cent. exported—is consumed by our people at the increased cost resulting from protection.

These statements of facts and figures illustrate the logical and practical effect of excessive duties in the increased prices which the consumer must pay. We need hardly more evidence of this fact than that as often as you offer to lower rates of duty you incur the opposition and arouse the ire of the advocates of protection. If tariff duties did not enhance the cost and price of articles on which they are laid, it would seem that the gentleman from Pennsylvania introduced his bill for free silk machinery as an idle pastime.

As a rule the duty enters into the cost and price of the article on which it is laid; but the rule has its distributing causes, and cases taken for illustration may mislead. In some cases these excessive duties have given such a stimulus to the production of goods at home that the supply cannot find a market. Of course none are imported; hence the revenue upon these articles has ceased, but the cost of the home product is so great that none can be exported. The final result is, no revenue to the Government, ruin to the manufacturers, high-cost goods to the consumer.

In other cases the consumer pays 100 per cent. more than he need for his goods, the Government gets no revenue, but must find a productive tax somewhere else and some rich pauper fattens on the plunder thus filched from the pockets of the people.

Neither does it follow that the blanket manufacturers enjoy a profit of $5,000,000 which they would not otherwise obtain. This, like other protective industry, is far from prosperous. We have imposed taxes on wool and on all the materials used in the process, and on the food, fuel, and clothing of the operative, and thus consumed much of the profits in the increased cost of production.

LABOR AND WAGES.

The tariff oppression of this country from its earliest inception has called in an ally that has given it the most substantial aid and has been the least rewarded. This was, is, and perhaps may continue to be the wages of labor, the dread of the "pauper wages" of Europe in its supposed effect on the superior paid labor of our own country.

This delusion is as fallacious and shallow as other protection pretexts. Official figures show that the labor was only 18½ per cent. of the actual cost of manufactures in 1870 when our tariff averaged 43 per cent., while in 1860, under a tariff of only 19 per cent. the labor was 20 per cent. of the cost of manufactures. (XII.)

If wages are high in the country that fact alone simply proves that labor is well employed and should therefore be let alone.

But it is not true that even if wages are higher in this country than in Europe therefore goods must cost more. It is skill and adaptation that assure low cost of production coupled with high wages to the workmen. If manufacturers have these qualifications they need no protection from a tariff; if they have them not, no tariff can save them.

The Congress of the United States may have great creative powers, but it cannot convert an imbecile infant into a stalwart self-sustaining and self-respecting man either by protection or privation.

The greatest of all fallacies is the dread of pauper labor in general. The wages in England are ten times as high as in India and China; five times higher than in Russia; double as much as in Germany, France, and the rest of Europe. Yet in every one of these countries the dearer labor of England competes successfully with their cheaper labor.

We have an example of this in the situation of our producers of surplus agricultural products. The land in Russia and on the Black Sea is much cheaper than in our Western States; the farm laborer earns indeed pauper wages, which is barely one-fifth of what it is in the West. Yet we must compete with our grain and do successfully compete in London and Liverpool markets with the grain of Russia and the Black Sea grown on cheaper lands and by labor costing one-fifth our own. And so we find that our system of protection, unequaled in the history of the tariff legislation for its enormous duties, and now five times as great as that of Great Britain, four times as great as that of France, six times that of Germany, more than twice as great as Russia or Spain, four times that of Italy, and twenty-five times that of Belgium, (XIII,) leaves the products of the grain and cotton fields to find a market in competition with pauper labor.

HOME MARKET.

The "home market" is another cheat and catch-word of the protectionists. After protection unequaled for half a generation the home market has not come to us, but is as far as ever removed from the fields of agriculture. Our surplus of grain has outgrown the wondrous growth of our population; it has not abated and will not abate. Uncounted millions have been given in protection on the false pretense of building a home market for the products of our fields, and to-day we are as far from it as before we began. Not only is this true of the country but it is true of Pennsylvania, the chief seat of protection. We now produce and export to the person about as much as in 1860. Pennsylvania produced in 1860 to the person 4¼ bushels of wheat and 9.7 bushels of corn, and in 1875 4½ bushels of wheat and 11⅛ bushels of corn to the person, and so the pretense of building a home market there for the products of grain fields is a sham and a cheat. In 1860 5 per cent. of our manufactures had to seek a foreign market; in 1875 only 2 per cent. found a market abroad, 98 per cent. at home; for manufactures protection has given a "home market." In 1860 not 10 per cent. of our agricultural products were exported for market, estimating by export of wheat and corn, and in 1875 22 per cent. of our whole agricultural product had to find a foreign market in competition with the products grown by that "pauper labor," against which we have been protecting ourselves at a cost of unnumbered millions; for agricultural products protection has not given and cannot give a "home market." (XIV.)

So long as men are dignified in sowing and in reaping, in planting trees and in helping them to grow, in owning their own labor, its products and its profits, our harvests will continue in excess of the demands of our people, our lands being in excess. And until we have reached our third centennial, when the State of Texas alone, still less densely populated than Belgium and parts of France, may contain a population equal to the present population of all the States; until we shall multiply and increase our 45,000,000 into 500,000,000 of people, agriculture will yield its 40 per cent. protection to manufactures in vain, for it will find no home market in return for its 40 per cent. of tribute.

TERMS AND PHRASES.

The terms used in describing the various articles imported and the names and classification thereof are those used in the Revised Statutes. Possibly the phraseology might be improved but the statutes have been in operation for nearly two years; very much of the descriptive language of tariff legislation has been in force since 1864; has received the interpretation of the Treasury Department or the courts and practical application by importers and customs officials; hence it is deemed unwise to do more than change rates of duty.

What the importing interests most desire and the Treasury most needs is stability, precision, and certainty, so far as attainable. To this end the language of existing legislation is in almost every instance employed, except in rates of duty, which is matter of computation only. (XV.)

SIMPLIFICATION AND REDUCTION OF RATES.

The chief merits of the bill are simplification of rates and reduction of rates.

Simplification is attained by sweeping away the double duties and bringing the rates to a strictly single, specific duty wherever practicable. The invention of double rates of duty is a means of hiding an enormous tax under a foggy complication, although it is sometimes insisted that wherever there is a double duty, one specific and one on the basis of value, the ad valorem rate is necessary to regulate and equalize the duty and bring it nearer to an equitable rate. If such is the object and it is a necessity, why keep a specific duty on the article? Why not make it altogether ad valorem, which will regulate the equity of the duty and simplify it as well?

The Treasury and the reputable merchants demand specific duties, ad valorem duties being open to dispute and undervaluation, resulting in collusion and fraud. The sweeping away of double duties everywhere and of ad valorem duties wherever practicable is an imperative necessity, and a single specific rate where it is possible to calculate values or classify articles a very wholesome reform. Yet it must be admitted that a uniform rate proportioned to the value of goods taxed is the most equitable of all tariffs, and should be adopted whenever the standard of official morality and accountability will justify it. Until then we are obliged to diminish the chances of undervaluations and fraud by levying duties in a specific form. (XVI.) Even now there might be no difficulty in imposing ad valorem duties if they are not too high; it is the high rates that make it pay to cheat. More revenue from lower rates, freer commerce, large exports; these should be the rules. Large imports at low rates would give ample revenue and would induce large exports. We cannot sell unless we buy, nor buy unless we sell.

The proposed reductions are believed to be moderate and consistent. There still remains an average duty of about 30 per cent. on cotton fabrics, about 25 per cent. on iron and steel, and about 40 per cent. on woolen fabrics. These duties are high yet and intended so to be, lest any radical reduction, when rates so high have prevailed so long, might seriously affect any of the great industrial interests of the country. The proposed rates afford still large incidental protection to the various manufacturing industries, larger in many instances than ever was had before the present tariff; estimated upon present values, quite as large as when the present duties were imposed wherever they are specific. And in the reductions of duty on raw material and in the free list manufactures find additional advantage and encouragement. None better know than the manufacturer that the present complicated and oppressive high tariff cannot last; he knows, too, that a change must come, and come speedily. It has been the purpose to present in this measure such a change in a spirit of fairness to all.

The reduction of rates results of course in a corresponding reduction of revenue unless cheaper rates bring increased importations. Increased importations, say the friends of protective monopoly, increase the foreign balances against us. This would be true, if the ships which bring foreign goods returned empty; not true, if they return with the cotton, corn, and other products of our grain-fields; not true, if commerce is an exchange which, to prevent its discontinuance, must be profitable to both parties to it; will not be true, until some means yet undiscovered shall be devised by which we can shut other nations out without shutting ourselves in. (XVII.)

BALANCE OF TRADE.

Foreign balances and balances of trade against us are some of the catch-words and false pretensions of protection. Once when this subject was being discussed I strayed over to the other side of the House. This is not a bad thing for one to do, for he may learn something there; but he must not stay too long, else he may learn too much. One of the front seats was then occupied by Mr. Hooper, a Massachusetts merchant, from whom I learned something of the balance of trade. He had shipped goods to China costing at Boston $8,000. These were sold at the port of destination for $50,000, and this was invested in goods there for shipment to the United States. These wares were sold in Boston for $100,000. Mr. Hooper had made $92,000; but the lists of imports and exports showed exports $8,000, imports $50,000. The balance of trade was against us, and we were on the highway to national bankruptcy because a citizen of the United States had exchanged $8,000 for $100,000. Mr. Hooper said that, though a "loyal man," he could not exactly see how this transaction had injured the country, and he made another venture with $100,000 in home exports. This time, when he had exchanged his goods at the foreign port for others valued at $200,000, and these had been shipped for the port of Boston, the ship, goods, and invoices went down in midocean. The customs lists showed $100,000 exports, no imports, and the balance of trade was in our favor—the country was prosperous. Let gentlemen, alarmed by the foreign balances against us, go to work and sink the ships laden with commodities received in profitable exchange for our products. This will appease their patriotism, settle the balance of trade in our favor, and is about as honest as the mode adopted by protectionists for accomplishing the purpose.

EFFECT ON REVENUE.

Upon the basis of importations of the last fiscal year (counting upon no increased importation) the loss or reduction of revenue below that of last year from change of rates amounts to $12,182,454.53. (XVIII.) The loss of amount (less than a half million) received from articles placed on free list is entire.

As to other articles which pay high rates, reduction of rates will increase importations and revenue. High rates are only productive of revenue in prosperous times, when revenue is abundant from other sources. To prove this it is only necessary to turn to the reports of receipts for the few years last past. Take, for example, the article of combing wool, as necessary to the life of woolen manufactures as is our daily bread to human life. When in 1872–'73 prosperity and abundance, real or apparent, were everywhere and the Treasury was overflowing, we received from this wool nearly $5,000,000. In the last year hard times came along; the Treasury was depleted; we received from this wool less than $620,000, one-eighth the amount and under the same tariff. (XIX.)

It has already been shown how the Walker tariff of 1846, which reduced the rates from 32½ to 25 per cent., (or one-quarter,) increased the revenue from thirty millions in 1845 to sixty-four millions in 1856.

It might be shown that when in 1872 consumption was most abundant the rates on salt were reduced from 18 to 8 cents, or more than 100 per cent.; the revenue fell off only about 25 per cent. in 1874 when consumption was restrained by financial oppression. (XX.)

It might be shown, too, that many articles are not imported, the duties on them being so high as to be prohibitory or nearly so. One of these is the article of blankets in common use, upon which the duty is 95 per cent. and on which we receive only about $8,000. When they shall be admitted at such rate as to be sold at a profit the revenue must be tenfold. (XXI.) The same is true of all overtaxed articles, and the loss of revenue from the proposed reduction of rates of duty is an assumption not warranted by the reason of the thing or the facts of the case. In this connection I desire to present some statements as to the details of the bill under consideration and the provisions of its several sections. By permission of the House I will publish these, together with some tables of statistics in illustration and support of my remarks, as an appendix thereto. (XXII.)

TIME FOR REFORM.

It has been urged by the opponents of tariff reform and even by tariff reformers that the time is not propitious for a tariff reform. If our present tariff is an outrage, an enormity, what better time than the present for a reform? The present law is either wise, just, and equitable, and therefore needs no change, or it is complicated, wrong, and oppressive, and cannot be changed too soon.

It is urged against any tariff modification that it is impolitic with the presidential election pending, upon the result of which it might have great effect. Assuming that any revision or simplification is needful, postponement for any such reason only evinces a purpose to deceive our friends that we may gain or retain power under false pretenses.

Again it is urged that in the present prostrate condition of all industrial and commercial interests, with factories idle and manufacturers becoming bankrupt, laborers out of bread and out of work under the present system, yet it must not be changed; but these facts give the most potent of all reasons why a tariff fifteen years in force, and under which we have come to this condition, should be changed. The fact is that to the opponents of tariff reform there is no fitting time for reform.

In 1872, when the country was seemingly most prosperous and revenue abundant, a tariff reform was urged. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, then and now on the Ways and Means Committee, with all his great power of eloquence and persuasion, urged the general prosperity of the country as the greatest of all reasons against a change in the tariff. A majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, through Mr. DAWES, its chairman, then reported a bill proposing some relief from the odious exactions of the existing law. Of that bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Judge KELLEY] spoke in the following terms of obloquy:

> The majority bill comes before us as a waif, fatherless, without parentage; it is in truth nullius filius. * * * It is wanting in form and comeliness; and if it has a spirit it is an evil one that bodes no good to the country.

No doubt he will speak of the bill under consideration in some such choice terms peculiarly his own. If such terms were employed against a measure coming from a committee of his own party proposing relief from a "war measure, a temporary measure," what may we not expect him to say of the pending measure?

Then, too, the leagues of iron-masters sent to Congress and presented through him their petition to be saved from the efforts they alleged of persons "whose views, while purporting to be guided by regard for American interests, suspiciously resemble those of foreign manufacturers," and from the fiendish machinations of "free-trade leagues" and "Cobden clubs" to influence American legislation, because protection had, said the iron-masters, made the country so prosperous. Doubtless we shall hear now again of the baneful influence of "free-trade leagues" and "Cobden clubs" because the country, in spite of the saving power of high tariffs, is on the road which leads away from prosperity.

It was then, too, (May 1, 1872,) that the gentleman from Pennsylvania drew the following glowing picture of what protection had done for his constituents. He said:

> Would that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. McNeely,] who spoke yesterday of their hopeless condition and the squalor in which they dwell, would spend a week with me in my home and look from my windows upon the clean brick houses with little gardens in the front and rear, with parlors well furnished, and many of them with a piano or melodeon, or other musical instrument; with their rooms lighted by gas and heated by patented processes; with bath-rooms supplied with hot and cold water, flowing every minute in the year. These, sir, are the houses in which our workingmen dwell, and thousands of which they own; many of them are under the shadow of the public-school house and the church, to the support of which the occupants freely and liberally contribute. A visit to a few hundred such homes would change the gentleman's opinions and convince even him that protection is the right of the laborer and a boon to the consumer.

This picture he presented as the result of protection and urged as a reason why it should remain untouched. Now hear what the Iron and Steel Association, summoned by him to testify in March of this year, say:

> With failure upon failure of our most experienced and respected iron-masters announced in the public prints from day to day, with wages of iron-workers necessarily reduced so low that they and their families can scarcely escape destitution and starvation, the American Iron and Steel Association is astounded to learn that a reduction of duties on foreign iron is seriously contemplated by the Ways and Means Committee, and it respectfully, through you, protests against such action.

And so four additional years of protection and oppression have converted these happy homes of "clean brick houses" into homes of men whose wages are so low that they can scarcely escape "destitution and starvation;" and still protection and oppression are unrelenting. If the testimony of the association, the witnesses summoned by the gentleman, as to the "destitution and starvation" which threaten the workmen of Pennsylvania is to be credited, it is reasonable to infer that the "clean brick houses" of workingmen are not the happy homes they once were; their musical instruments will probably tell of little happiness while "starvation and destitution" threaten its inmates; for "hot and cold water" some tears may be "flowing every minute in the year." With all this changed condition in four years who shall say that that squalor of which Mr. McNeely spoke will remain away from these homes if this system is to continue? Yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania and his witnesses "hope the committee will allow the duties on iron and steel and all other manufactures to remain as they are until the country recovers from its present widespread prostration."

Still another reason was then urged by him for keeping up protection, which he asserts is no taxation; he wanted to abolish all internal taxes, as he then said:

> So that in 1876, when our customs revenue, as I believe it will, shall have reached $230,000,000 per annum, and our interest account shall have been greatly reduced, the world may assemble to celebrate our one hundredth birthday and find America a free and untaxed nation. That is possible, and that I aim at accomplishing.

This prophecy this very year will fall about $100,000,000 short of fulfillment; but $100,000,000 is as near fulfillment as could be expected of a prophet who standing in the United States Congress talks two hundred and thirty millions into the Treasury of an "untaxed nation." So much of "the world" as may assemble to celebrate our one hundredth birthday will find us, not "untaxed," but about the best taxed nation on the globe. Still the advocates of protection are unrelenting. Then we must not touch the tariff because the country was prosperous; now we must not touch it because it is not prosperous. With them there is no fitting time to loosen the hold which selfish greed has made so firm.

Ought we not, therefore, consider whether these high and in many instances prohibitory duties shall remain? If revision is needed, the present is the most fitting time to rectify a too long continued wrong.

NEEDS OF REVENUE.

Sir, there is another grave matter worthy our consideration in this connection, involving the faith of the nation and the good name of its people. This is the needs of the Government for current expenditures and to meet the requirements of the public debt. Without a revision of customs duties, new objects of taxation must be found, or new loans and additional interest-bearing burdens created. This opinion is shared by many thoughtful men of all shades of political opinion, as well as by part of the press, having no great sympathy either with free trade or the party that has hitherto urged it.

The New York Times is usually conducted with as much of fairness as is compatible with the support, defense, and apology it has lately been called upon to make for its party. In reviewing the commercial situation and the unsatisfactory condition of our import, export, and carrying trade, it concludes an article on 17th of April as follows:

> The tariff has recently received little consideration as a disturbing element in our foreign commerce. Nevertheless the constant and rapid decline in the receipts from customs must before long command the serious attention of Congress and the country. For the last four years the customs revenue has been as follows:

1872	$216, 370, 287
1873	188, 089, 523
1874	163, 103, 834
1875	157, 167, 722

> For the current year, ending June 30, the receipts can barely reach $150,000,000, and may fall below that sum. In 1874 and 1875 they fell below those of any preceding year since the close of the war. The very large imports from Europe into Canada afford a strong presumption of smuggling on a considerable scale across our northern border, and it certainly is an open question whether diminishing the duties is not, in the present case, the only effective method of increasing the revenue. The foreign trade of this and all the other great commercial cities of the country depends for its very existence on the interchange of our productions for those of other countries. Now that the imports have dwindled to a little more than half their volume four years ago, and the export trade partakes more and more of the nature of a sheriff's sale, we suggest to the interests threatened with destruction the propriety of giving the matter of tariff legislation a little serious thought. Nothing probably can be hoped for from the present Congress, but the time is at hand for the nomination of Representatives, and in many cases efforts to nominate capable and earnest men would not be thrown away.

And the same paper, in its issue of May 9, further says:

> Considered either as an instrument for stimulating manufactures or securing a revenue for the Government, our present scale of duties on imports is by far too nearly prohibitory.

To this statement of the Times, which states last year's revenue from customs three millions too great, it may be added that the imports of the current year, as shown by returns for first three quarters, will fall 11 per cent. below last year's imports, which, but for increased rates laid on by last Congress, would reduce the revenue to $137,000,000; and with the 10 per cent. increased taxation re-imposed by last Congress our customs receipts will fall ten millions below last year's receipts. Ten per cent. increased protection results in ten millions decreased revenue. (XXIII.) Here is an admission that "the constant and rapid decline in the receipts from customs must before long command the serious attention of Congress and the country;" that "it certainly is an open question whether diminishing duties is not in the present case the only effective method of increasing the revenue;" that "the imports have dwindled to a little more than half their volume four years ago, and the export trade partakes more and more of the nature of a sheriff's sale;" that "our present scale of duties on imports is by far too nearly prohibitory for stimulating manufactures or securing a revenue." And "nothing probably can be hoped for from the present Congress," says the Times, in the matter of tariff legislation. Why nothing from this Congress? And if not from this, from what Congress may we expect something? Certainly we have nothing to expect in the matter of tariff legislation from a Congress (if we shall ever again have one) representing the party which imposed the present duties under pretext of the necessities of war, and maintained them in disregard of the requirements of peace.

SIMPLE TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY.

We repeat, the present tariff is a failure; that it promotes fraud, invites smuggling, offers a premium to unfaithful officers, and that it serves fitly neither the purpose of revenue nor protection. Yet its reform is a work of much difficulty. It worked injustice and wrong in its enactment, and some injury is unavoidable in its repeal or modification.

Branches of industry have been forced into unnatural conditions during its continuance, and innocent persons may suffer even from the removal of its abuses; hence the changes we advocate are moderate, but our purpose is to open the way for a moderate, simple tariff for revenue only.

It is often erroneously urged that we must maintain high rates of duty upon a great number of articles in order to get a sufficient customs revenue.

The proposition of obtaining more than $150,000,000 of revenue from customs, with the least interference in the pursuits of the people, would be a very simple one, could we now take up the question unbiased by theory and free from present conditions. We should lay down in advance a few simple principles, bearing in mind—

That tariff is another name for taxation; and that all taxes upon foreign imports are paid by consumers in the proportion of their consumption;

That there is no article of domestic production whatever into which some article of foreign origin does not enter as an element of cost;

That the cost of all domestic products is therefore increased by the imposition of tariff taxes on foreign imports;

That all tariff taxes should therefore be placed upon articles which enter directly into consumption, and not on those which enter into the processes of industry. No tax should be laid on the process of industry, all taxes should come from results;

That since all taxation works more or less to the privation of the citizen, taking as it does a portion of his property, the endeavor should be made to take by taxation a portion of the things that can best be spared;

That taxation should interfere as little as possible with the freely chosen pursuits of the people.

The people of the United States, being in possession of the largest body of productive land of any civilized nation, and dealing with it on the whole with intelligence, have the greatest consuming power as to foreign comforts and luxuries of any nation, hence they can pay the largest customs revenue with the least hardship, provided the duties are intelligently imposed.

It is a common error or misstatement to suppose that our imports consist in any great degree of luxuries. On the contrary, an analysis of our imports will show that they are made up about as follows: Of articles of necessity, 22 per cent.; of articles of luxury, 9 per cent.; of articles of comfort, 35 per cent.; of textile fabrics, wares, &c., 34 per cent.; and that in 1869 we received revenue from these several classes as follows, (XXIV:)

From articles of necessity	$43,000,000
From articles of comfort	55,000,000
From articles of luxury	21,600,000
From textiles, and wares, glass, &c.	54,500,000

Our population is now seven or eight millions more than in 1869; hence, under the same rates and conditions the revenue would be at least 25 per cent. greater.

We might therefore place in the free list all articles of necessity that enter into the processes of industry; we would tax the articles of comfort at low rates in order to get the most revenue from the largest consumption; we would tax articles of luxury within such limits as not to induce smuggling and not to impair our power of exporting and exchanging commodities for them. If, having made necessities free, comforts and luxuries failed to yield enough, then we would tax the textiles, china, glass, paper, and the like at such moderate rates as would interfere least with their imports and give the least possible stimulus to the diversion of industry from other pursuits to their manufacture, always remembering that where protection begins revenue ceases.

The consuming power of the masses of Great Britain is small compared to that of the people of our own country, and it must always be remembered it is the multitude who pay tariff taxes, not the few who own property. Yet Great Britain, with a population of about 32,750,000 in 1874, raised a customs revenue of £19,508,942, or $97,519,710, from only twenty articles, namely:

Spirits, brandy, and wines	£5,619,031
Tobacco and snuff	7,522,207
Tea	3,435,586
Chiccory, cocoa, husk, and choc	103,987
Coffee	199,205
Molasses	1,927
Currants, figs, plums, prunes, and raisins	490,258
Sugar	502,608

and having a surplus revenue that year abated all duties on sugar.

If we assessed the same articles in the same manner, the greater purchasing and consuming power of our people would give a much larger revenue per head, which, taken in connection with our larger population, would carry our revenue from customs on the same system almost if not quite up to the sum we need. But as we could not obtain so much customs revenue from tobacco, being home producers of that article, a surplus revenue duty not exceeding 10 or possibly 15 per cent. on textile fabrics and other goods ready for consumption would give us more than all we need. But we cannot hope to attain this end except by moderate and successive steps, of which the pending measure is presented as the first. It may contain some errors, possibly some inconsistencies. It is by no means such a complete readjustment of the tariff as is demanded, but it is a step in the right direction, a promise of better things to come, a means to a great end which we shall surely reach, and to which, if we are not led by reason and justice, we shall be forced by necessity.

APPENDIX.

I.—List of trades given by Sir Josiah Child, in 1692, as lost to England by reason of her navigation acts and protective policy.

1. The Russia trade, where the Dutch had last year twenty-two sail of great ships and the English but one.
2. The Greenland trade, where the Dutch and Hamburgers have yearly at least four or five hundred sail of ships and the English but one last year and none the former.
3. The great trade in salt from Portugal and France, and salt, wine, and brandy, to the easter lands.
4. All that vast and notorious trade of fishing for white herrings upon our own coast.
5. The east country trade, in which we have not half so much to do as formerly, and the Dutch ten times more.
6. The trade in wool to Bilboa.
7. Their great trade to China and Japan, whereof we have no share.
8. The trade to Norway.
9. A great part of the plate trade and many more.

In 1875, with a population of 44,060,000, we had an importation of 317,017,309 pounds of coffee, which, with a tariff of 3 cents per pound, would yield a revenue of $9,510,519, or a duty of 21 cents to the person.
The same year our importation of tea was 64,708,079 pounds, and this, with a duty of 15 cents per pound, would yield a revenue of $9,706,211, or 22 cents to the person. We should thus secure a revenue of nearly $20,000,000 on these two articles alone, with a tax to the individual of only 43 cents per year.

XI.—Table showing volume of manufactures produced and consumed in the United States in 1870 or 1875, with rates of duty which enter into their cost and price.

	Cottons.	Metals.	Woolens.	Total.
Home manufactures	$300,000,000	$370,000,000	$250,000,000

Average rate	37%	36%	56%

In 1870 the total manufactures of the United States (and they are no less now) were $4,232,325,442, all of which are protected at an average rate of 45 per cent. Exported, $95,276,403, and consumed the remainder, $4,137,049,038. If manufactures of this value consumed by us each year were imported from a foreign market the duties to be paid on them would be $1,861,672,067, which would go into the Treasury; but as they are made at home and protected, whatever increased cost results from protection goes to the manufacturer.

XII.—Table showing that in 1860 with low tariff the wages were 21 per cent. of the cost of manufactured articles, and in 1875 with high rates of duty the wages only 18 per cent. of the cost of manufactured articles.

	Total United States production.	Wages.	Ratio of wages to cost.
			Per cent.
1860	$1,885,861,676	$378,878,906	21
1870	4,232,325,442	775,584,343	18

The protection at present rates is double the value of labor in manufactured articles. The wages are now 20 per cent. lower than in 1870; yet then, in one hundred dollars' worth of goods, there was but $18 labor and the rest, $82, material, &c., with an average duty exceeding 40 per cent.; while in 1860 with an average rate of duty of 19 per cent. the value of wages in manufactured goods was 21 per cent.

XIII.—Statement showing imports, duties, and rates of duties of various countries.

1873	France	$710,960,000	$43,630,803	6.37

1874	Great Britain	1,850,413,505	96,712,210	5.22
1875	United States	547,050,117	154,554,982	28.25

NOTE.—The above rates are estimated on total imports; the rate on imports paying duties in the United States averages 45 per cent.

XIV.—Statements showing that a greater portion (98 per cent.) of manufactured articles found a market at home in 1875 than in 1860, when 95 per cent. went abroad, while more agricultural products had to seek a foreign market in 1875 (22 per cent.) than in 1860, (then 10 per cent.,) and that even the highly-protected State of Pennsylvania continues to produce sufficient grain for her own consumption, or nearly so, as in 1860.

XV.—Statement as to terms employed and language used in preparation of tariff bill.

In the bill the committee adopted the words and phrases used by Congress in the Revised Statutes to describe articles imported into the United States.

There is reason to believe that the revision is not in all particulars a faithful transcript of the language previously used by Congress, and which it was the purpose of the revision to codify.

In a few instances, possibly in many, the language of the statutes, or its interpretation by the customs officers, has imposed a higher rate of duty than was levied by the Treasury Department on a similar article before the Revised Statutes took effect. They have now been in force for nearly two years and much of them pertaining to tariffs twelve years; the committee retained this description and classification of imported articles as they stand in existing laws, that the importing interest of the country may have permanence and certainty.

Tariffs are made, or ought to be made, for the guidance of business men. So long as the United States cultivate commercial relations with foreign countries it is due to foreign manufacturers and to our own consumers that the description of imported articles in tariff acts be not changed when it can be avoided.

Duties upon imports are in effect taxes upon the consumer. These taxes can only be collected by authority of law, and, as in other cases, matters of doubt and uncertainty must be decided in favor of the tax-payers. The importer has a right to claim that Congress shall specify the article which is to be the subject of the duty and the rate of the duty in such clear and precise terms that business men can understand them.

When there is doubt as to whether terms used in a tariff law include imported articles and the question is matter for judicial determination, reference is always made to persons familiar with the character and quality of the merchandise in question to ascertain what was the intention of Congress. The committee believe that as to most of the articles now known to trade and commerce about which there is any ambiguity in the language of the Revised Statutes, the questions have been either discussed and disposed of by the Treasury officials or the courts, so that the importing community understand what meaning the Government puts upon the phraseology used in existing laws. And it is for this reason that the committee have in almost every instance adopted the language of existing legislation, the character, quality, and description of the article in question being conceded.

It is believed that, aside from the rates of duty, it would be almost impossible to frame a new tariff law enumerating either generally or specially all the possible articles to be brought from foreign countries, without involving the Government and importers in litigation undesirable to both.

It is very natural that in the interpretation of new terms, and in questions of commercial designation which are oftentimes intricate, the officer seeking to protect the Treasury may exact the highest rate, leaving the aggrieved importer to his rights in a court and subsequent decision of the Treasury Department.

The existing tariff laws also provide severe penalties of forfeiture for an intentional misdescription of imported merchandise in an invoice or entry when made with intent to defraud the Government and deprive it of revenue legally chargeable on merchandise imported. Out of misdescription, innocent in many cases no doubt, has arisen much objectionable confiscation and forfeiture at our large ports. To prevent this in future, and as far as possible to prevent all litigation, it has been determined to retain in the bill the precise language of existing laws, changing only the rates of duty.

XVI.—Statement showing the complicated enormity of present double duties and the necessity of a change to a simple, single, specific duty.

The duty on bunting, a woolen manufacture, under existing tariff is 20 cents per square yard and in addition thereto 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Perhaps not ten members of the Congress which fixed this rate realized that it amounted to the enormous rate of 117 per cent.

In 1875 we imported 2,612 square yards of bunting, costing in Europe $634, or 24 cents per square yard. The duty collected on this was as follows:

	Cents.
Duty per square yard	20
Duty ad valorem, 35 per cent. on 24 cents	8.40
Total duty	28.40
Total cost of square yard	24.30

Thus the duty was 4.1 cents more than the cost of the goods and is 117 per cent.

Take the duty on printed calico not over 200 threads to the square inch. The present duty is 6½ cents per square yard and in addition thereto 15 per cent. ad valorem; yet this duty amounts to 64 per cent. ad valorem.

An official return will be found for 1875 of an importation of 479,715 square yards, costing $63,174, or 13.2 cents per square yard. The duty collected thereon was $40,657.61, which is 64.36 per cent. on its foreign cost. Now, no one, save perhaps a few experts at the time when this duty was enacted, really intended to tax a common article of cotton print costing 13 cents per square yard 4 per cent. higher than silk velvet, as in fact the ad valorem duties on cotton fabrics whenever double duties were not imposed was only put at 35 per cent.; hence the double duty which hid the extravagant rate.

A uniform rate of percentage on goods, if levied in specific form by the yard, pound, or other quantity, is an impossibility; all that can be done is to make specific rates as near to a uniformity of percentage as is practicable. It is better that slight inequalities should exist in specific rates than to continue collusions, undervaluations, and frauds, by maintaining ad valorem rates. This fact was well understood and acted upon in England while that country exacted duties on foreign manufactures. In 1859, before the Cobden commercial treaty, the duty on all gold watches in England was 7 shillings and 6 pence and on all silver watches 2 shillings and 6 pence each, without regard to the value of either.

XVII.—Statement showing how the United States shuts herself out of the Canadian market by high duties on Canadian imports, by which they are prohibited from exchanging with us.

Importations of cotton goods into Canada from—

United States	525,709	419,809	906,874	1,350,208

We cannot sell unless we buy, nor buy unless we sell; nor can we shut other nations out without shutting ourselves in. It is because of the violation of those rules that Canada on our border is forced to exchange products with nations across the sea.

The importations for first three quarters of present fiscal year showing a falling off of 11 per cent. in imports, so that we shall have about ten millions less revenue this year than last, though the last Congress re-imposed the 10 per cent. (increased) duty.

XIX.—Statement showing that high duties are only productive of revenue in prosperous times, when revenue is abundant from other sources, and that lower duties will give more revenue and cheaper goods.

In the fiscal year of 1872–'73 there went into consumption 43,844,604 pounds of combing wool, paying the double duty of 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. ad valorem.

The Treasury for that year received a revenue from this wool of $4,950,462.97.

Two years later, in 1875, when the Treasury really needed revenue, we find that only 5,480,525 pounds went into consumption of the same kind of wool, and the Treasury only received $618,253.09 revenue.

Thus we find a falling off of more than $4,000,000, and a like falling off in importations; which clearly proves that a high tariff in hard times defeats the purposes of revenue.

The bill before the House reduces the duty on this wool to 5 cents per pound, which reduces the revenue receipts, based upon the importation of the last fiscal year of 1875, $344,226.69. But as there is every reason to hope that by the very release of the present enormous duties the trade in wools and woolens will revive, and that we may expect again to import 43,700,000 pounds of this combing wool, see how the revenue at the reduced rate of duty will stand then.

In 1875 we imported of combing wool 5,480,528 pounds; the revenue at 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. ad valorem was $618,253.09. If we again import as we did three years ago only 43,700,000 pounds of this wool, the duty at 5 cents per pound will amount to $2,185,000; or, in other words, the Treasury will get at 5 cents per pound duty more than three times as much revenue as it did in 1875 at 10 cents per pound and 11 per cent. ad valorem, while the advantage to the woolen trade and to the people will be immense. What is true of this article of wool is true of nearly every other article upon which there is a protective duty.

XX.—Statement showing that reduction of rates does not result in corresponding reduction of revenue.

The duty on bulk salt up to 1872 was 18 cents per 100 pounds, which was over 100 per cent. on its cost; at this rate of duty we imported during the fiscal year ending 1872 257,637,230 pounds, and got a revenue of $463,747.03. We reduced the duty from 18 cents per 100 pounds to 8 cents per 100 pounds, which ought to have reduced the revenue, calculating upon the basis of that year's importation, exactly $257,637.23. Now what are the actual facts?

In 1873 we imported 369,008,917 pounds of bulk salt, over 112,000,000 pounds more than in 1872, and got at 8 cents per 100 pounds a revenue of $295,927.08, or only about $168,000 less than the previous year.

In 1874 we imported 427,294,309 pounds of bulk salt, and got $341,835.22 revenue. Therefore the second year, instead of losing $257,637.23, we only lost $122,911.81.

Little harm to the Treasury and a benefit to the people, who have, during the last three years, got their salt from 10 to 12 cents average a bushel cheaper than under the enormous high duties. Will any one deny the benefit of 10 cents or 12 cents per bushel on the salt? Or can any one deny that instead of losing $257,000 to the revenue by reduction of rates we only lost $122,911? No one can assert that our salt industries are ruined; they are, in fact, more prosperous than ever.

XXI.—Statement showing that lower duties will give more revenue.

We get a revenue of only some $8,000 from foreign blankets, and yet we consume more than 2,000,000 pairs annually. The duties on blankets, especially those in general use, are prohibitory. For instance, a pound of ordinary blanket, costing in Europe two shillings a pound, or 50 cents, is subject to a double duty of 30 cents a pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem, which is exactly 95 per cent. duty. We cannot, therefore import any at such a fearful rate of duty; but in the pending bill it is proposed to reduce the duty to 30 cents per pound and leave off the 35 per cent. ad valorem. Even at that rate, which is much too high, being 60 per cent., we may reasonably expect to import some blankets, and it may be safely predicted that instead of only $8,000 revenue we will get $80,000 or $100,000 revenue, while on the other hand the consumer will have the benefit of getting his blankets 35 per cent. cheaper.

XXII.—Statement of details of bill and provisions of its several sections.

The pending bill contains six sections. Section 1 is a revision of rates in cotton fabrics. The assumed loss or falling in revenue below that received in 1875, based upon that year's importation, is $1,618,417.39. Substantially no complaints have been made of the proposed reduction of duties on cotton goods. While duties have been considerably lowered, there still remains an average duty of about 30.69 per cent. on cotton fabrics, which through increase in importations will give the Treasury a largely increased revenue over that which it is receiving from this source.

The bill further simplifies the rates, makes them single, and with few exceptions specific.

Section 2 of the bill revises and reduces the rates on iron, steel, and other metals, and some articles of hardware. The estimated loss of revenue below 1875, calculated on last year's importation is $1,483,336.28. The rates are not materially changed wherever the duties were as low as 35 per cent., but greater changes in rates were made wherever the duty was found to be double. The average rate of duty is still left at about 25 per cent. The usual protest of iron and steel associations, iron leagues, and iron-masters was and is made against a reduction of rates in these and all other duties. These protests were of the most unreasoning kind, as will appear by reference to the rates of duty and prices of dutiable articles.

The duty on steel rails is $28 a ton, the cost of steel rails in Europe is £10 a ton, or $50; supposing it to cost £1 or $5 per ton to bring to New York, the cost, including duties and freight, would be $83 a gold ton.

The present price for steel rails made here is $60 to $62 currency a ton; hence the foreign rails are entirely prohibited. This bill changes the duty to $15 a ton, which would make foreign steel rails cost $70 gold a ton in New York, or $77 currency, $15 higher than home-made rails. Yet steel-rail-makers object to a reduction of rates which still excludes steel rails from importation. Left in possession of our market as exclusively their own we find them prostrate but still protesting. The tariff with its high rates impotent for good, yet the infatuated steel-rail-makers still cling to its absurd provisions. The same may be said in relation to very many articles in this section. Herein will be found a reduction of duties on copper from five cents to two cents per pound. The copper-smelters of the Calumet and Hecla mines have the monopoly of our copper trade. Our people pay them twenty-two to twenty-three cents a pound for copper, but they ship from five to six million pounds of their surplus copper to Europe, and sell it there for eighteen cents a pound.

American copper, most suitable of all for making cartridges, is shipped and sold 5 to 6 cents a pound cheaper to the cartridge-makers of England than to our own, and then with this 5 to 6 cents advantage they exclude our trade from South America, Mexico, Egypt, Turkey, and other foreign countries, while the prohibitory duty on Chili ore has entirely destroyed a prosperous business in copper-smelting in this country.

And what of the revenue from copper? In 1874 we got a revenue of $32,127.09! in 1875 we got a revenue of $2,865.68. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] showed too much when showing that in 1875 the Lake Superior mines produced 17,500 tons of ingot copper of 2,240 pounds per ton, or 39,200,000 pounds. On every pound of this (less 6,000,000 pounds exported) the tariff gave them 5 cents a pound, or the sum of $1,700,000 bonus, paid by our consumers; the Treasury got $2,865 revenue only. So the tariff on copper is not revenue, but simply a tax on the people for the benefit of the Hecla and Calumet mine-owners, who produce copper at a cost to them of 13 cents per pound. Double duties have given place on articles in this section to simple and specific rates. Nor have too radical reductions been made, the object being to simplify and reduce rates, avoiding too sudden changes.

Section 3 changes the duty on cigars from $2.50 per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem to $3.50 per pound; on paper cigarettes to $2 per pound, and increases the duty on foreign leaf-tobacco from 35 cents to 40 cents per pound.

This simplification and change to a single specific duty on cigars diminishes the chances of undervaluations, while the rate is slightly increased. In 1875 we imported 745,484 pounds of cigars, and collected, at the rate of $2.50 per pound and 25 per cent. ad valorem, $2,565,074.69; the single rates now fixed, $3.50 per pound, the revenue on the 745,484 pounds would have been $2,609,194, or an increase of only $44,120. The rate of $3.50 per pound on cigars averages about 93 per cent., and is not excessive, in view of internal taxes, either for consumers or revenue. The present duty on leaf-tobacco, 35 cents per pound, is, according to the official returns, 62 per cent. The increase of 5 cents per pound will make it about 71 per cent. It is used in the manufacture of cigars, always classed and taxed as luxuries and now taxed at a much higher rate. This 5 cents a pound increase on tobacco will give an increase of $375,000 to the revenue.

Section 4 is an entire revision of rates on raw wool and woolen fabrics. The rates on almost every article in the present schedule of wool and woolen goods has been simplified and reduced. Raw wool has been changed from a double to a simple specific rate, and reduced to half of the present rates. Experience has shown that whenever there is large importation of foreign wools our home-grown wools advance in price, being required for mixing with Australia, Cape, and other wools. Hence this reduction of rates must prove beneficial to manufacturers and consumers, while it creates a demand for domestic wools, which must appreciate in value and price. On woolen fabrics there is still left a very high duty, in some cases as high as 50 per cent. These high rates were retained that a too radical change might be avoided. Many of the woolen fabrics now pay a duty of 90 to 95 per cent. In reducing them to 50 per cent., the change in the first stage of a revision was thought to be more advisable than a too sudden reduction, though the average rate is 41 per cent. The duties are, in the main, specific, and doubtless some inequalities remain which in a specific rate is unavoidable.

Section 5 simplifies duties on sundries, changes the double duties on gunpowder, marble, pencils, pens, soap, and varnish from double duties to a single specific and lower rate, and reduces the duties on paints, linseed-oil, building and other stones, emery-ore, licorice, dye-stuffs, and sundry other articles, chemicals, and medicines. Many of these articles were in the bill, introduced by me, in the free list, and certainly ought to be there still. It is greatly to be regretted that dye-stuffs, saltpeter, and, above all, quinine, is still found among taxable articles. This medicine, used in every humble dwelling in the land, is to be taxed 15 per cent., or about 40 cents a bottle or ounce. In 1875 the total revenue we got from quinine was $3,498.20; now the home production as stated by competent authorities is 800,000 ounces, every ounce of which was enhanced by means of the present duty of 20 per cent., or 50 cents an ounce, thus increasing the cost to the sick and ailing $400,000 a year, and the division of the tax is $3,498 to the revenue and $400,000 to two or three immensely rich, bounty-fed manufacturers; but the bark of which quinine is made is free of duty, as further bounty to these protected favorites.

In this section will be found an increase of 50 per cent. duty on champagne. The present duty of $6 a dozen quarts champagne is equal to 52 per cent. on the foreign cost.

The duty on common still wines at 40 cents a gallon is equal to about 100 per cent., on brandy it is 105 per cent., on cordials 107 per cent., on spirits made of grain it is 320 per cent., while on whisky the internal-revenue tax is equal to about 400 per cent.

The increased duty on champagne will make it equal to about 78 per cent., and will still be the lightest taxed wine on the list, (excepting perhaps a few thousand dozen of still wines in bottles at 40 cents a gallon,) and will give $535,000.

It is urged by importers that the importation at $9 duty per dozen will fall off. The article is a luxury, and consumers who can afford to use it are not likely to be deterred by an increased duty of 25 cents per quart bottle. Yet this increase may cause the introduction of inferior wines, which is probably the best if not the only reason which may be urged against it.

Block-tin has also been taken from the free list and taxed 3 cents per pound. This metal is not produced here at all, and is the only metal that is found on the free list. There is no reason why it should not pay a duty of 3 cents per pound, which is about 15 per cent. on its cost, all the increase going into the Treasury and no reduction having been made in rates of articles into the manufacture of which it enters.

Section 6 contains a list of articles that are intended to be made free of duty. They include plants, shrubs, trees, seeds for garden, agricultural, and horticultural purposes; but are mainly medicines, chemicals, and dye-stuffs.

The total loss to revenue by freeing these articles is estimated on last year's importation at $434,170 80. These articles are in the main raw material that enter into manufactures and are reproductive. Many of them yield no revenue at all or a revenue so ridiculously small that keeping them upon the taxable list can only be for prohibition and protection.

The following revenue was received in 1875 from articles placed on the free list, namely, from—

These make up the greater number of articles placed on the free list, and surely it cannot be maintained that their remaining among the dutiable articles is in the interest of revenue. There are other articles, however, that should be placed on the free list, and by retaining which upon the taxable list the same wrong results as in the article of quinine. These should be considered when separate articles are acted upon.

[During the delivery of the foregoing speech, Mr. MORRISON's time was, by unanimous consent, extended on motion of Mr. TUCKER.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a measure attempting to adjust more equitably the burdens, and to distribute more fairly the benefits resulting from tariff duties, deserves the early and earnest consideration of the House. The present tariff rates were established during the war and were the necessary outgrowth of its vast expenditures. Returning peace has but slightly modified their unnecessary and rigorous exactions. To frame a bill which, without disturbance to existing industries or injustice to different sections or interests of the Union and without impairment of the revenue, shall lighten taxation, is a most difficult and delicate task. The Committee of Ways and Means have, I concede, earnestly labored to accomplish this result. Their work is before the House, and I regret that it has come from the committee so defective and incomplete that unless materially amended I cannot support or urge its passage. Whatever its purpose it must be judged by its scope and probable effect. Containing much that is commendable, it is, in my judgment, imperfect in its details and adjustment of tariff rates, and as a revenue measure would prove disastrous to the public credit.

Reform, not reduction of revenue, should be the object of tariff revision. Insufficient revenues would successfully demand of another Congress the re-imposition of repealed duties. The misconception or disregard of the future needs of the Treasury was the fatal mistake in the tariff reductions of 1832, 1837, and 1872. The necessity for higher duties to meet current expenditures passed the tariff acts of 1842, 1861, and 1875. Let us not repeat the folly that produced the reaction.

But, Mr. Chairman, in so far as the pending bill seeks to relieve taxation, to reduce to a revenue standard excessive duties upon leading manufactures, to lower prohibitory rates so as to permit fair competition, and to prevent extortionate prices through combination, it has my sympathy and approval.

Its purpose, as avowed by the chairman, to lessen the burdens upon consumers, diminish bounties to favored producers, simplify the mode of imposing and ascertaining duties, and place upon the free list dutiable articles returning but little revenue, deserves support.

TARIFF REVISION NECESSARY.

That the present tariff needs revision cannot be denied. Its highest rates were imposed and adjusted during a period of heavy and augmenting importations incident to a vast war and to meet the necessities of the Treasury in carrying it on. Increased cost of production, occasioned by internal taxation, justly entitled domestic manufactures to compensation by imposing increased duties upon similar imported commodities. To re-imburse himself for tax and duty upon imported raw material, the domestic manufacturer demanded and obtained higher tariff rates on foreign products competing with his own.

Upon the close of the war the manufacturers successfully appealed to Congress to remove taxation upon raw material and domestic production. The high compensatory duties on foreign manufactures, however, are still retained. War rates, no longer required by the Treasury, and which the domestic manufacturer no longer could claim, have been and are now continued. Were the resulting benefits and burdens equally distributed among and upon the different industries and sections of the Union, there would be less cause of complaint.

In the case of imported articles of general consumption, the enhanced price which constitutes the burden upon the consumer is compensated by the benefit to the Treasury from the payment of the duty. But the enhanced prices which the consumer by reason of the tariff pays upon domestic articles benefit the manufacturers and their dependent employés and industries. The consumer bears the burden, but seldom shares in the benefit.

In the discussion of this question to which I am inviting attention I desire to disavow any opposition to a tariff for revenue. For the next thirty years at least, what Hamilton and Madison would have called a high tariff is an inexorable necessity. The public debt for interest and sinking fund will require for that period a tariff averaging 30 per cent. or more on dutiable imports. Such revenue tariff raising $130,000,000 annually will necessarily be protective. Manufacturers ask for stability. A revenue tariff will stand as long as the public debt remains.

The proper office of a tariff, the raising of revenue, is sought to be diverted to the exclusion of foreign competition. A reduction of duties to the former rates has been and is now opposed by those who regard protection as the end and revenue the incident of a tariff. They ask for rates that shall exclude the cheaper foreign article, so as to give the market to the dearer American product.

American manufacturers must control American markets is the high-tariff catch-word. How do the duties enable American manufacturers to control the market? Surely by compelling the importer to charge the consumer a price increased by the amount of the duty, just below which price the American manufacturer with ample profit can offer his own goods.

The purpose of the protective duty is to give the manufacturer a better price. In no other way can it aid him. Without the duty he admits the competition would lower his price and his profits.

PROTECTED INDUSTRIES.

There are at present six leading protected industries: manufactures of cotton, woolen, and silk fabrics, iron and steel, paper and glass. They have an invested capital of over $400,000,000, and their annual production is double that value.

Of the three largest of these industries affected by the proposed change of duties, cotton, woolen, and iron and steel, the census and customs statistics give us this information:

Number employed in and value of products of manufactures of cotton, iron and steel, and woolens in 1870.

Manufactures.	Number employed.	Value of products.
Cotton	135,369	$177,489,739
Iron and steel	139,982	331,738,504
Woolen and worsted, including carpets	105,071	199,257,292
Total	380,422	708,475,595

The precise effect that the present duty has and the proposed reductions of the bill will have upon the price of these commodities is not capable of exact estimation. If their price is augmented to the extent of the rate of duty imposed on similar imported articles, then the American consumers of these goods, in addition to the $43,000,000 in gold paid for revenue upon $90,000,000 of imports, pay upon $708,000,000 of domestic manufactures $225,000,000 for the benefit of home production. The proportionate duty and enhanced price paid upon each of the three classes would be:

Manufacture.	Duty in 1875 on imports.	Average rate of duty.	Domestic product.
			Value.	Estimated enhanced prices.
Cotton	$9,043,654	40	$177,000,000	$66,000,000
Iron and steel	6,814,200	35	332,000,000	86,000,000
Woolen and worsted	27,821,177	60	199,000,000	74,000,000
Total	43,679,031	.....	708,000,000	226,000,000

The estimated reductions of duties in the bill from the duties received during the last fiscal year amount to $12,182,454.53, of which the reduction on cotton, iron, steel, and woolen manufactures is estimated to be $9,741,100.

The principal benefits will therefore inure to the consumers of those articles if the duty increases the price. Consumers will not only be relieved from the tariff tax on the imported article, but from the enhanced price of the domestic article. The total reduction anticipated from the bill on the four manufactures named would be, on the basis of the census returns for 1870 and duties received for 1875, $66,000,000.

Article.	Value of imports.	Value of domestic manufactures.	Reduction of duties.	Percentage on value.	Reduction of prices on domestic manufactures.
Cotton manufactures	$24,199,793	$177,000,000	$1,618,417	.06⅔	$11,000,000
Iron and steel manufactures	20,474,244	322,000,000	1,195,869	.058	20,000,000
Woolen manufactures	45,627,923	199,000,000	6,926,874	.15	26,000,000
Total	90,301,960	733,000,000	9,741,100	.....	57,000,000

If the reduction of tariff revenues $9,000,000 will lessen the taxation upon consumers even $30,000,000 or $20,000,000 without serious injury to the interests affected, the proposed revision of rates should be adopted. The computation assumes that the American consumer, by reason of the tariff, pays an increased price for the goods he purchases. It supposes that the importer charges the duty in the price asked of the purchaser, and that similar domestic goods are advanced in price to the same extent. If true, the injustice and favoritism of high protective duties are apparent and indefensible. It is important to ascertain, if possible, upon whom tariff duties fall.

WHO PAYS THE TARIFF DUTIES?

Surely the consumer of the dutiable imports. "No," say the manufacturers, "the foreign producer seeking our market pays the duty." For proof, the price of some exceptional commodity in great demand at a period of high prices is selected and compared with subsequent prices, and it is assumed that the tariff lowered the price. The manufacturer does not believe it; for he wants no duties, or low duties, on his raw materials, because he wants them cheap. He asks high duties on his products, so that he may get a better price.

I will not attempt to argue the proposition; it seems too absurd. Facts, logic, and common sense deny it.

Here is what one of the ablest, fairest, and most distinguished advocates of governmental protection for manufacturers says of the proposition.

John Quincy Adams, speaking from years of public service in the administration of the affairs of the Government, in a most able report upon manufactures made in 1832, the portion of his successor's message referred to the committee of which he was chairman, said:

> The doctrine that duties of import cheapen the price of the articles upon which they are levied seems to conflict with the first dictates of common sense. The duty constitutes a part of the price of the whole mass of the article in the market. It is substantially paid upon the article of domestic manufacture as well as upon that of foreign production. Upon one it is a bounty, upon the other a burden, and the repeal of the tax must operate as an equivalent reduction of the price of the article, whether foreign or domestic. We say, so long as the importation continues, the duty must be paid by the purchaser of the article.
> The incidental effect of competition in the market, excited, on the part of the domestic manufacturer, by the aggravation of duty upon the corresponding article imported from abroad to reduce the price of the article, must be transient and momentary. The general and permanent effect must be to increase the price of the article to the extent of the additional duty, and it is then paid by the consumer. If it were not so, if the general effect of adding to a duty were to reduce the price of the article upon which it is levied, the converse of the proposition would also be true and the operation for increasing the price of the domestic article would be to repeal the duty upon the same article imported—an experiment which the friends of our internal industry will not be desirous of making. We cannot subscribe, therefore, to the doctrine that the duties of import protective of our own manufactures are paid by the foreign merchant or manufacturer.

There are many indications that tariff duties enhance prices, and consequently manufacturers' profits among them:

First. Accumulated wealth of the manufacturing States.

Second. Large deposits in banks.

Third. Dividends of manufacturing companies in high-tariff periods.

Fourth. Effect upon imports if producer pays duty.

Fifth. Comparison of prices of same article under successive tariffs.

WEALTH OF MANUFACTURING STATES.

If the tariff secures for the manufacturer of protected articles bounties exacted from consumers, localities and States where the favored industries flourish should show a rapid and greater increase in wealth. Consistently with this view the greatest manufacturing States stand among the foremost in the census returns in the per capita amount of wealth. The average is in—

New York	$1,483 27
Massachusetts	1,463 03
Connecticut	1,441 30
Rhode Island	1,366 28
Pennsylvania	1,081 31
New Jersey	1,038 49

In contrast, States as old, having as fertile soil, that furnish our great staples for export, have not one-half of the wealth.

BANK DEPOSITS IN MANUFACTURING STATES.

These also indicate large accumulations. The total individual deposits in all the banks of the United States in May, 1875, amounted to $2,017,453,300.87. Of this the banks of the following manufacturing States held far in excess of their proportion according to population:

New York	$704,385,307 70
Massachusetts	308,349,025 21
Pennsylvania	194,917,452 50
Connecticut	92,495,122 70
Rhode Island	59,238,036 63
New Jersey	54,683,592 78
Total, six States	1,414,068,537 52

The remaining thirty-one States and eight Territories have but $600,000,000 of deposits.

This wealth may, and doubtless in part has been, largely accumulated from other pursuits than manufacturing.

MANUFACTURERS' DIVIDENDS.

The dividends of manufacturing companies indicate the effect of high and low tariffs upon prices. Manufacturers' profits, if the cost of production is uniform, will depend upon the prices obtained for their products. Higher prices paid by consumers insure larger profits and dividends. If the foreign producer pays the tariff duty without charging any part of it to the consumer, the domestic manufacturer cannot be benefited by the tariff; for the higher or lower price at which his goods can be sold determines the amount of his profit. If the duty does not permit the domestic manufacturer and compels the importer to charge the consumer a higher price, the manufacturer has no interest in the duty. If the manufacturer's profits are greater under high tariffs than low tariffs, we may conclude it is because the tariff has secured, as it is designed, a higher price for products than the consumer would have paid without it.

Greater dividends at such periods must be attributed to this cause, unless some other more probable reason is apparent.

Many years ago a publication was issued, and has been annually continued, showing the yearly dividends of New England manufacturing companies. They vary with the condition of business and state of the currency. I condense from a table presented to the House in remarks I made a year ago, and group these dividends by tariff periods:

Profits of New England manufacturing companies under high and low tariffs, as shown by Martin's Tables of Manufacturing Dividends, published in 1871, and by subsequent annual appendices, on dutiable imports, and average rate of duty for different tariff periods.

Year.	Average per cent. duty on dutiable imports.	Average dividends for periods.	Remarks.
1832	33.8	13.
1832 to 1834	32.8	11.40	Compromise tariff reduction one-tenth biennially to 1841, thereafter 20 per cent.
1835 to 1836	34.3	11.75
1837 to 1838	31.6	7.25
1839 to 1840	30.2	6.87
1841 to 1842	26.6	5.
1843 to 1846	32.5	12.44	High tariff.
1847 to 1857	24.1	6.36	Low tariff.
1858 to 1861	19.	6.71	Low tariff, 24 per cent.
1862 to 1872	4.27	12.10	High tariff.
1873 to 1875	39.20	8.30	10 per cent. reduction.

They almost invariably show greater dividends under the higher tariff. For instance, they averaged 13 per cent. in 1832, and became gradually reduced with the 10 per cent. biennial reduction of the compromise tariff of that year, until 1841 and 1842, when they averaged only 5 per cent. The tariff of 1842 brought them up to 12¼ per cent. The eleven years' low-tariff period from 1846 gave dividends averaging 6.36 per cent., while the eleven years' high tariff of 1862 and 1872 gave 12.1 per cent. The profits of these companies in the present depression and suspension of business for the year 1875 were 5¼ per cent. notwithstanding many mills have been idle or running on half time for want of consumers for their goods.

LOSS TO THE FOREIGN MANUFACTURER.

If the foreign producer lowers the prices of cotton fabrics 40 per cent., of iron and steel 35 per cent., of woolens 60 per cent., upon the imposition of tariff duties at those rates, how profitable his industry must be that can afford such a reduction. But in a country where capital is abundant and interest low he is content with profits much less than our manufacturers obtain. Ours range from 3 to 15 per annum and abroad the average is from year to year less than 6. The foreign manufacturer might forego his profit and lower his prices 6 per cent., but far better to close his mill than attempt from year to year to bear a loss of 60, 40, or even 35 per cent., which in less than three years would exhaust not only his profit but entire capital.

FOREIGN PRODUCER'S LOSS ON OTHER EXPORTS.

The absurdity of the claim that the foreign producer pays the duty imposed by another country on the article he ships abroad is evident when an estimate is made of the loss he must sustain on his total exports. For the market price of the commodity will necessarily be the same to purchasers from all countries. The exporter will not and cannot sell 10 per cent., much less 50 per cent., lower to one purchaser than to another.

Take the case of exports from Great Britain and France. They have the whole world as a market for their products.

LOSS ON EXPORTED SCOTCH PIG-IRON.

According to the Bureau of Statistics, in 1870 there was produced of pig-iron in Scotland 1,206,000 tons.

	Tons.
The United States received of this	97,170
Germany	87,101
Netherlands	68,606
France	40,000
All other foreign countries	132,232
England, Scotland, and Ireland	232,891
Local consumption	506,000

If the Scotch iron-masters in order to market in the United States 8 per cent. of their entire product lower the price on pig-iron $9 per ton—the amount of the American duty in 1870—so that iron was no higher in the United States by reason of the duty, they lost not the $874,530 duty on the 97,170 tons shipped to the United States, but $9 per ton on their entire product, amounting to a loss of $10,854,000. The canny Scotchman would save at least $9,000,000 by wholly withdrawing from the American market and selling only to other countries.

BRITISH EXPORTS.

In 1874 the total exports of Great Britain were valued at $1,098,702,180, of which the United States received $161,191,105. The duties paid the United States were above 40 per cent. If the British manufacturers lowered their prices 40 per cent. in order to compete with the American manufacturers, thus saving the American consumers from paying higher prices on account of the duty, the loss on the total exports would be over $400,000,000.

The total exports of Great Britain in 1874 of iron and steel were to all countries 2,487,162 tons; United States, 184,053 tons. The production of pig-iron alone was over 6,000,000. A reduction of but $1 per ton on account of the American duty would cause a loss of $2,400,000 on the total iron exports and take from the iron-masters over $6,000,000 on their total.

There were exported in 1873 from the United Kingdom the following comparative values of iron and steel and their manufactures, and cottons and woolens, to all countries and to the United States:

	All countries.	United States.
Cottons	$386,318,060	$26,093,731
Woolens	153,716,855	48,016,959
Iron and steel	188,656,195	47,475,263
Total	728,691,110	121,585,953

The loss to the British exporters, if they lower their prices so as to place the value of $121,585,953 of goods upon the American market without any enhancement to the purchasers, would be over $300,000,000. The comparative export of pig-iron was: To the United States, 102,624 tons; other countries, 1,039,441 tons; the duty, $718,368; loss, $9,276,087.

FRENCH EXPORTS.

France exported in 1873 to the United States $76,000,000 values of commodities, out of $964,560,000 exported to all countries. Her exports to all countries and to the United States in 1872 and 1873 of silk, woolen, cotton, and linen goods were as follows:

	United States, 1872.	All countries, 1873.
Silks	$33,507,351	$95,712,934
Woolens	8,946,944	71,042,099
Cottons	1,171,143	17,051,863
Linens, hemp, &c	1,417,521	9,271,963
Total	45,042,959	193,078,859

(Monthly Reports Commerce and Navigation, 1875, pages 27 and 206.)

The duties collected by the United States on the portion imported into this country amounted to about $26,000,000. If the French producers paid this duty by lowering the price to that extent, as they must lower it also to purchasers from other countries, they would lose over $100,000,000 in order to find a market in the United States for goods of the value of $45,000,000.

COMPARISON OF PRICES.

But the fairest and most satisfactory test of the question is to compare prices of the same article during high and low tariffs; not a selected date, but average prices; not an article manufactured by some newly discovered patented process, therefore high-priced, like Bessemer steel until the patents expired, but a stable article like pig and bar iron, steel, salt, domestic cottons, and woolen goods.

Almost a half century has transpired since the tariff of 1832 was framed. A generation has been born and buried since infant manufactories were nourished by the tariff of 1842. What lower prices have these protective duties—never lower than 24 and running to nearly 50 per cent.—secured for us than our fathers paid?

In this field of inquiry we are not left to conjecture, nor dependent upon selected statistics or imperfect recollection of partial and disingenuous writers and witnesses. In former years the facts have been gathered through our officers at home and abroad under the direction of able and impartial Secretaries, like Webster, McLane, Meredith, and Chase. I shall rely for my authority upon reports among the archives of the Government. A comparison on textile fabrics is difficult, because the weight, fineness, finish, and quality of woven goods of the same name may vary, and the price is affected by the fashion and demand for the pattern and the price of the raw material. If cotton manufactures are selected and the prices of to-day compared with those of the same goods thirty years ago, it will be found that they are now much higher. In 1872 they were fully double the prices of 1842.

Contrast the prices of the same brand, make, and style of goods reported in 1849 in the Treasury reports and the quotations in the New York Bulletin for February, 1872. According to the Treasury report the prices as compared with those in this paper in 1872 were:

	1842.	1872.
Sheetings	6 to 7	12½ to 15
Shirtings	6¼	12
Drillings	7⅛	15½
Prints	5¼	11½
Tickings	11	22

The prices of cotton goods were lower before the tariff act of 1842 was passed and after it was repealed than during the four years it was in force, although the average price of raw cotton was less. It however is difficult to tabulate the prices of cotton and woolen, the description varys so much from year to year.

Brown sheetings, shirtings, drills, and ticking of certain mills have the same stamp and brand of thirty years ago.

I give their quotations for their goods at certain dates of low and high duties and at the present time of depressed prices:

	1842.	1848.	1872.	1875.
Brown drills—
Suffolk	7½	6¾	15½	.....
Stark	7⅞	6⅞	15½	9½
Blue drillings	9	8¼	16	.....
Brown sheetings—
Appleton 30-inch	5½	5½	12	8
New Market A	8½	6¾	13	8
Great Falls	7¼	6¼	11	7½
Tickings—
Amoskeag A C A	14½	9½	31	21½
Amoskeag A	13½	12½	25	17½
Amoskeag B	11	11	20½	22-15½
Hamilton	11	9½	22	13-15

As textile fabrics are so variable at different times in regard to quality and cost of raw material, I ask an examination of the price of metals and particularly the

PRICE OF IRON.

Fact is better than theory. The Secretaries of the Treasury have procured and preserved in executive documents the wholesale price of iron and other articles for nearly fifty years. For the purpose of comparison I have arranged in a table the annual average price of pig, bar, and railroad iron from the passage of the tariff of 1842 until 1875, reducing currency to gold prices, and only giving the latter. The tariff periods and average price and duty for each period are given. The price of railroad iron is taken from the monthly commerce and navigation reports for 1872.

Grouping prices by tariff-periods, the averages are:

Years.	Scotch pig-iron.		Bar-iron.
	Duty.	Price.	Duty.	Price.
		Per ton.		Per ton.
1842	$7 56 per ton.	$25 00	$21 40 per ton.	$57 00
1843 to 1846	9 00 per ton.	33 25	25 00 per ton.	67 50
1847 to 1857	30 per cent.	28 50	30 per cent.	51 50
1858 to 1861	24 per cent.	23 50	24 per cent.	45 25
1862 to 1864	6 00 per ton.	25 65	18 96 per ton.	58 33
1865 to 1875	8 81 per ton.	33 72	21 79 per ton.	70 36
1876	7 00 per ton.	.....	.....	.....

In 1842, under the compromise tariff of 1833, the duty on pig-iron was $7.56 per ton and the New York wholesale price was $25 per ton. The duty on bar-iron was $21.40 per ton and the price $57 per ton. The tariff act of 1842 increased the duty on pig-iron to $9 and on bar iron to $25 per ton. The prices rose until in 1846 pig-iron sold for $38 per ton and bar for $78. The act of 1846 reduced the duty on pig-iron and bar-iron to 30 per cent. ad valorem, and the prices gradually fell to $21 for pig-iron in 1851 and to $36 for bar-iron the same year, and the average prices during the eleven years that act was in force were for pig-iron $28.50 and for bar-iron $51.50.

In 1857 the duty was still further reduced to 24 per cent., and continued at that rate for four years, during which time the average price per ton of pig-iron was $23.50 and of bar-iron $45.25. In March, 1861, duties were increased to $6 per ton on pig-iron and to $15 per ton on bar, and the latter rate in the next and subsequent years raised to $19.50 and $22.40 per ton.

During this period of higher duties the prices reduced to gold value were for pig-iron $25.65 and for bar $58.33. In 1864 duties were further advanced to $9 per ton on pig-iron, and continued at $22.40 on bar-iron, and bore that rate until 1870, during which period of six years pig-iron sold for an average price of $31.06 gold. And the average gold price for bar-iron for eight years, under a duty of $32.40, was $72.02.

The latest New York wholesale-price quotations on pig and bar iron at this time of depression are not lower, but actually higher, reduced to a gold basis, than they were over twenty-five years ago, being (I quote from the Treasury Report) in 1851 of—

Scotch pig-iron	$21 00
American bar-iron	36 00

Indeed the average prices, reducing currency to gold, under the present rates compared with the prices under the tariffs of 1846 and 1857 have been under tariff of—

	1846.	1857.	1864.
Pig-iron	$28 50	$23 50	$33 72
Bar-iron	51 50	45 25	70 36

Twelve years of high duties give us no lower prices at any period than the price twenty-five years ago, while the average price is $20 per ton higher on bar-iron under the present tariff than under the tariff of 1846 for the same number of years, and $5.22 per ton higher on pig-iron for the corresponding periods.

If it be said that the latter period embraced a period of inflated prices and large demand for iron, so did the closing years of the first period. Both show, as the prices of every year show, that the foreign prices of iron rule the American market, and the consumer pays the larger proportion, if not the whole, of the duty on iron. When the mania for railroad building on the European continent increased the demand for iron, and the Franco-German war of 1870-'71 and the immediate demand to repair the destruction caused by that war advanced the price of iron abroad, our manufacturers on a declining cost for coal and labor advanced their prices to the extent that the duty would permit. American pig-iron was advanced in 1872 to $45 and $50 per ton, and bar-iron to $100 per ton, being from 50 to 100 per cent. above the cost of manufactures as the prices of 1837, 1869, and of to-day show.

SALT.

The relation of prices to rate of duty is unmistakably illustrated in the case of salt. The claim that the tariff had reduced the price of salt, and that the article was in 1870 lower than before the high duty then upon it was imposed, led to a careful examination of prices for the last fifty years. These, averaged for the successive periods of differing rates of duties, show that the wholesale price in New York was highest during high-duty rates upon salt and lowest under low rates. The result proves that on salt the duty has been paid by the consumer.

* Duty per one hundred pounds reduced to average rate per bushel.

The salt-makers charged in 1871 at the seaboard double the price for salt that they were compelled to accept when the duty was practically but three cents per bushel.

The highest export price of foreign salt at Cadiz in 1842 was five cents per bushel, and in 1843 sold as low as four cents per bushel; at Turk's Island for eight cents per bushel, and at Dublin for forty cents per sack, as is shown by the consular reports to the Secretary of State in 1845. (See Executive Document No. 73, 1845.)

Common sense, sound logic, authority, and actual comparison of average prices of imported goods under different tariffs teach us conclusively that the consumers of our imports pay the duty or the greater part. To what extent prices of protected domestic manufactures are enhanced cannot be computed with accuracy.

THE AMOUNT OF TARIFF BOUNTY is difficult of ascertainment. The advantage of the tariff to the domestic manufacturer is in preventing foreign competition from reducing or preventing him from advancing his price. Whatever enhancement of price the tariff secures him, that is his protection. It is practically to him bounty, to the consumer a tax for his benefit. Were imports of every description of iron, steel, cotton, and woolen manufactures meeting similar domestic articles in competition in our markets, it would be safe and fair to assume that the rate of duty is the measure of the bounty.

If the enhanced price of domestic manufactures of iron, steel, cotton, and woolen is equal in degree to the duty imposed, the manufacturers through the tariff on an annual production of $700,000,000 obtain a bounty amounting to $225,000,000. On about eight hundred millions of foreign and domestic goods consumed the tariff tax would equal nearly $270,000,000. On the average per capita consumption of about $20 of the goods the tax would be $6, or $30 per family; $5 of it for revenue, $25 for bounty.

But many of these products receive and to be successfully manufactured require little or no protection. They can be made as cheaply as similar articles in foreign countries. Receiving no protection, their prices are not raised by the duty. They defy competition here and for a third of a century have been exported to foreign countries. Probably one-half of cotton and one-third of iron and possibly one-fourth of woolen manufactures are but slightly affected directly by the tariff duty on similar foreign goods.

After an elaborate examination of duties and comparative prices, Robert J. Walker, in 1847, came to the conclusion that in regard to the great mass of our imports the enhanced price is about equal to two-thirds of the duty. He said:

> As regards that portion of the resolution which inquires how much the price of articles will be increased to the consumer by the augmented duty, this Department begs leave most respectfully to refer to its report to the Senate (in answer to a similar inquiry) communicated on the 23d of July last. By reference to that report and the tables and prices current thereto appended the following principles would seem to be clearly established as a general rule, subject to modification in some respects by extraordinary causes, such as greatly increased or diminished production, changes of season, augmentation or diminution of demand and supply, and also to increased or diminished cost of production: First, that where the article is produced more cheaply in our own country than abroad the price is not affected by the duty. Second, that where the difference of the cost of manufacturing or producing an article here as compared with the same cost abroad is less than the duty, the enhancement of price nevertheless cannot exceed such difference in the cost of production, although the duty may be much greater. Third, that where the duty exceeds or is equal to the difference in the cost of production, the enhancement of price, as proved by actual prices current exhibited in that report, is, as a general rule, in the ratio of 119 to 75, or about two-thirds of the duty.
> By reference to the tables appended to the report of the 23d of July last, it appears in regard to the great mass of our imports that the enhanced price, taken in the aggregate, is about equal to two-thirds of the duty. Whatever theories may have prevailed upon either side on this subject, this seems to be an ascertained fact, proved by actual prices current appended to the report. As a general rule, in the cases referred to, it appears that about two-thirds of the duty falls as a burden upon the consumer by enhancing prices to that extent. The question upon whom does the tax fall equivalent to the remaining one-third of the duty, whether in some cases in part upon the foreign producer or in part upon the American exporter of all our products, or upon both, and in what proportion, is a most interesting inquiry; but the answer, requiring much time to collect the necessary foreign and home prices current, and not being called for particularly by the Senate, is not obtruded upon its consideration at this time.

Applying this estimate, and the consumer can be consoled with the reflection his contribution for bounty and revenue is reduced one-third, and that his annual cotton, woolen, and iron assessment is only $20, of which the revenue gets one-fourth. The annual consumption of cotton and woolen manufactures on the basis of 1870 census reports is over $11 per capita, or $55 per family, and a two-thirds enhanced price by reason of the duty would exact about $12 from each family in the United States if each equally consumed the goods.

Allowing that only one-half of the production is similar in kind to imported articles, and that upon the latter the price is augmented to the extent of only two-thirds of the duty for every $43,000,000 of revenue collected, domestic manufacturers of cotton, woolen, and iron and steel pocket $75,000,000 of bounty. In paying for revenue a per capita tariff tax of $1 upon clothing and iron and steel consumed each consumer has contributed $1.75 to sustain these domestic industries. Each family will average nearly $14 contribution—$5 of it for the Treasury, $9 for manufacturers' dividends.

INJUSTICE TO OTHER INDUSTRIES.

This exhancement of price of the products of the three selected manufactures, amounting on the estimate of Secretary Walker to $150,000,000, or at the lower figures I have given to $75,000,000, inures to the benefit of manufacturers employing less than 400,000 men, women, and children, scarcely 3 per cent. of the total number reported in 1870 in all industrial pursuits.

The non-protected shoemakers, blacksmiths, and masons outnumber these workmen, and the carpenters and joiners alone nearly equal them.

Contrast these industries in number engaged and value of product with agricultural and other industries:

Occupation.	Number employed.	Percentage.	Value of product.
All occupations	12,505,923
Total agriculture	5,922,471	0.47	$2,447,538,658
Total cotton, iron, steel, woolen, and worsted manufactures	388,941	0.03	708,475,695

The inequality of the distribution of the benefits and burdens of protective duties is apparent upon an inspection of the number engaged in these industries and a comparison with others:

Blacksmiths	141,774
Carpenters and joiners	344,596
Boot and shoe makers	171,127
Railroad employés	154,027
Draymen, hackmen, and teamsters	120,756
Clerks in stores	222,504
Teachers	126,822
Masons	89,710
Painters	85,123
Carriage and wagon makers	42,000

If imposed to secure higher wages, high tariff duties are asked in behalf of 380,000 laborers at the expense of 12,000,000 of other laborers, such purpose is manifestly unfair. The non-protected blacksmith or shoemaker ought not to be assessed on his own clothing for the purpose of keeping up the cotton-spinners' and cloth-makers' wages. The earnings of nearly 3,000,000 of farm laborers, averaging but $107 a year, ought not to be taken to sustain the wages of factory operatives averaging three times that sum.

But tariff bounties accrue to the benefit of capital rather than labor.

I have shown how dividends are swollen and wealth accumulated and hoarded in the States most largely engaged in the protected industries.

The manufacturer appropriates the lion's share. He invests in enlarged mills and factories, substantial and improved residences, railroad bonds, bank or corporate stocks, or loans on mortgage security. His accumulated wealth, often freely expended, gives in favorable times activity and prosperity to surrounding dependent industries. The locality and its inhabitants seem to flourish as well as the factory and owner.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOUNTIES.

Let me not be charged with sectionalism in arraying the census tables to show where the tariff showers its generous favors. It is not to excite envy or hate, but to appeal to equity and justice. The manufacturing States have less than one-fourth of the whole population. Seven States produce 85 per cent. of all the cotton and woolen manufactures. The total production of these States in 1870 was valued at $321,489,204. Were the price raised to the extent of duty the bounty to these manufacturers would be $120,000,000. But subtracting one-half for goods able to compete with foreign goods without a duty, and charging only two-thirds of the duty as enhanced price upon the remainder, the bounty rolls up to $40,000,000. It certainly exceeds that sum. It gives over $3 bounty to every inhabitant. The proportion of Massachusetts is $14,000,000; Pennsylvania, $8,000,000; Connecticut, about $5,000,000; New York some less, and Rhode Island above the latter sum, and Maine but $3,000,000. The bounty to thirty other States, containing three times the population, reaches but $7,000,000. Let me present the figures in tabular form:

Value of manufactured products of cotton and woolen (including worsteds and carpets) produced in the United States and certain States according to the census of 1870.

DUTY ON SILK.

But besides the industries I have discussed there are others which appropriate equally enormous bounties. None of these are reached by the bill reported. As raw silk and silk goods were almost wholly foreign products in the sweeping provisions for war revenues Congress raised the duty on silk goods to 60 per cent., putting 35 per cent. on the raw silk and in manufacture. It gave the silk manufacturer an enormous protection, for although his nominal rate was 60 per cent. less 35, equal to 25 per cent., the latter rate applied not to the additional value the manufacturer gave to the raw silk, but to the whole value, being over 50 and in some cases 100 per cent. upon the manufacturer's added value. Subsequently the silk manufacturers procured, to the detriment of the revenue, a repeal of the duty on raw silk and an increase of the duty on silk-mixed goods from 50 to 60 per cent. ad valorem. Their protection upon the added value given by them to the raw silk is on some classes of goods over 200 per cent.

Why the committee have stricken silk from the original bill or not reduced the duty upon silk goods to 50 per cent., which is about the present revenue rate and still excessive in its protection, is to me inexplicable.

The report of the silk association contains the following from the secretary's report:

The year 1875 was the most prosperous year that the silk industry in America has ever experienced, if considered in respect to the quantity of raw material consumed and the amount of labor employed in silk manufacture.

Accompanying the report are communications from manufacturers in the various branches. Messrs. Hamil & Booth say of the manufacture of plain and fancy broad silks:

The year 1875 has been a prosperous one for the silk manufacture, and the broad silk weavers have been favored with a good demand for their goods.

Mr. William Strange says of ribbon manufacture:

It seems to me a subject for congratulation and pride, not only to those directly interested, but also to the community at large, that, while nearly all the various industries of the country have been forced into inactivity and distress since the panic of 1873, during the past year our branch has formed in many respects an exception to the general rule. On behalf of our branch of the silk industry, I am pleased to be able to report an increase of at least 50 per cent. in production and consumption over any previous year, with a corresponding decline in imports.

General statistical view of the silk industry in America for the year ending December 31, 1875.

States.	Number of firms and manufacturing corporations.	Total number of operatives employed.	Wages paid.	Value of capital invested and employed.	Total value of production.
New Jersey	57	8,456	$2,990,618	$5,926,804	$11,064,185
New York	76	3,561	1,489,038	3,703,983	5,663,619
Connecticut	24	2,863	985,367	4,570,449	5,430,692
Massachusetts	12	1,398	374,381	1,506,290	2,748,431
Pennsylvania	24	1,384	474,007	1,706,632	1,794,794
All others	20	345	136,945	499,700	456,350
Exhibit for 1875	213	18,007	6,390,356	17,913,858	27,158,071

It is not surprising that a business receiving a protection of 60 per cent. on the cost of similar imported commodities, and which, if the price of the domestic product is enhanced to the amount of the duty, receives a bounty on $27,158,071 of $10,000,000, should be profitable. The beneficiaries are:

New Jersey, about	$4,000,000
New York, about	2,000,000
Connecticut	2,000,000
Massachusetts	1,000,000
Pennsylvania	650,000
Remainder of the Union	350,000

As France ships to the United States less than one-third of her exported silks, besides consuming at home a large quantity, it is improbable to believe that her manufacturers are selling silk goods materially lower on account of the production here.

The fatal objection to the bill, however, is, as I stated at the outset, its reduction of the revenue from leading protected articles without a compensatory increase from sources affording simply revenue.

The total value and duty collected upon dutiable imports entering into consumption in the United States during the fiscal year 1875 were as follows:

Manufactures.	Value.	Duties.
Total	$379,795,113	$154,271,805
Cotton	24,199,793	9,043,654
Wool and woolen	55,856,545	30,914,037
Silk	24,516,416	14,037,998
Iron	10,730,412	3,277,002
Steel	9,743,832	3,537,198
Sugar and molasses	82,209,853	37,157,246
Total six classes articles		97,967,135
Total all other		56,304,670

If $12,000,000 is taken from these duties, it must be made good from something else.

TEA AND COFFEE.

The chairman proposes to make good this reduction by imposing a light duty on tea and coffee. They are strictly revenue duties. Every dollar of increased price to consumers goes into the Treasury. The consumption extends to every portion of the country; the burden is therefore equitably distributed and no locality has exemption. The annual importations are nearly uniform, and the revenues therefrom reliable and not variable, as in cases of iron, silk, cottons, and woolens. Although articles in common use, they are not as indispensable as salt and sugar, now taxed, nor more necessary to the laborer than clothing and implements.

The laborer, relieved by the bill of $4 tax and bounty for himself and family on their garments and utensils, will gladly pay $1.50 per annum on his tea and coffee for the purpose that his fathers paid a similar duty three times as high until the national debt became extinct.

FREE BREAKFAST-TABLE.

Why give free tea and coffee and tax sugar? In 1875 the country consumed of imported coffee, $50,591,488; tea, $22,673,703; sugar, $82,209,853.20; duty, $37,157,245.53. The duty on sugar was imposed and one year ago increased for revenue.

So long as the public debt requires heavy taxation, tea and coffee are among the very best subjects from which revenue should be obtained. The annual revenue therefrom will be nearly uniform, the burden light and equally distributed.

A tax of 2 cents on coffee and 5 cents on tea will impose a tax of only 20 cents per capita on the country, or $1 per family. The annual customs and internal revenues amount to $30 per annum per family, as follows:

Spirits	$7 50
Tobacco	5 00
Sugar	4 50
Woolen goods	3 25
Cotton and linen	1 75
Silk	1 50
Crockery and glass	50
Other articles	6 00

The tax-payer will be no more heavily burdened by paying $1 on his tea and coffee than he would by paying the same amount on tools and clothing. The latter are as indispensable to the laborer as the former. This pure revenue tax, to be applied toward the reduction of the debt, would be as cheerfully paid by the people now as it was paid by our fathers from the adoption of the Constitution in 1789 to the extinction of the debt in 1832.

Laws imposing, increasing, or continuing the duty on tea and coffee were approved by Washington and Madison.

The first tariff bill passed by Congress in 1789 imposed duties on tea and coffee.

In 1816 James Madison approved a tariff bill framed and recommended by A. J. Dallas, his Secretary of the Treasury, which imposed a duty on coffee of 5 cents per pound, and on teas, bohea 12 cents; souchong and other blacks 25 cents; imperial, gunpowder, and gomee 50 cents; hyson and young hyson 40 cents; hyson skin and other green 28; average 31 cents. Imported in other than United States ships, average price, 42 cents.

The duty on tea and coffee was again imposed during the war of the rebellion, and should have been continued until the national debt was extinguished. Its repeal necessitated the imposition and maintenance of customs and internal taxation less easily collected.

For the restoration of this tax the chairman has the indorsement of the action of the early statesmen of the Republic, the sanction of every advocate of a revenue tariff. It has received the approving indorsement of some of the ablest statesmen that have managed the finances of the country.

John C. Spencer, Secretary of the Treasury under John Tyler in 1843, recommended the re-imposition of tea-and-coffee duty. He said:

The articles now free of duty which present themselves most prominently as subjects of impost are teas and coffee. The opinions of importers of these articles, of merchants and officers of the customs in various parts of the United States, as communicated to this Department in pursuance of its request, are unanimously and decidedly in favor of such duties, as "more equal and less burdensome than any other mode by which the same amount could be collected." From the organization of the Government to the year 1832 duties were laid upon these articles. In that year they were repealed, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, which was made, as he stated, in consequence of the national debt being extinguished and the revenue being abundant for the public service. The reason for that policy having ceased, and additional revenue being indispensable for the most economical administration of the Government, it cannot be doubted that our fellow-citizens will acquiesce in the necessity which requires such an impost as cheerfully as in any other burdens which they are called to bear for the security and protection of themselves, their property, their rights, and liberties.

Notwithstanding the opinions of some, I cannot doubt that the price of these articles would be enhanced to the consumer to some extent by the imposition of duties. But it may be questioned whether this effect would not be temporary. * * * But whatever may be the increase of price to the consumer, and whether it be permanent or temporary, it would be fairly distributed among the whole community, for nearly all are consumers. It cannot be supposed that duties to the amount of four millions, distributed among nearly eighteen millions of persons, would be seriously felt by any, even assuming that the consumers would exclusively bear the burden, and that it would not be divided between them and the producers.—Executive Document, Twenty-eighth Congress, first session, page 12.

Robert J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury under James K. Polk in 1847, in view of the increasing debt growing out of the Mexican war, said:

This Department has not recommended any change of the tariff of 1846, except a duty of 25 per cent. on tea and coffee, as the least onerous, the most certain and available; to be levied only as a war duty, and to pay the expenses of the war, and liquidate the debt created thereby.

In later times, for a similar purpose, Chase, McCulloch, and BOUTWELL favored the imposition or retention of this tax.

CAN THE MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES PROSPER UNDER A REDUCED TARIFF?

They can. They may forbode disaster and prophesy destruction. So they reasoned in 1832 and 1846. The salt-makers foresaw ruin from the reduction of 1872; but the domestic production continues, with less profit perhaps to capital, but cheaper prices to consumers. But each decennial census has recorded a growing production of iron, cotton, and woolen manufactures, outrunning the increase of population as well as of agricultural production. The growth was steady, continuous, and healthy.

The iron mines of the Lake Superior region were opened under the tariff of 1846. The shipment of ore commenced in 1856, and increased up to 1860 as follows:

	Tons of ore.	Tons of pig-iron.	Value.
1856	7,000	.....	$28,000
1857	21,000	.....	60,000
1858	31,035	1,629	249,202
1859	65,679	7,258	575,529
1860	116,908	5,600	736,496

This development was under a tariff of 24 per cent. ad valorem.

Who will say the revenue tariffs of 1846 and 1857 did not give sufficient encouragement to manufactures? The increase of production was from $1,019,106,616 in 1850 to $1,885,861,676 in 1860.

Population increased but 36 per cent., manufacturers 87 per cent. in the decade.

From 1850 to 1860 the increased production of iron, cotton, and woolen goods was in advance of the increase of population. That of 1860 to 1870, reducing currency to gold and prices of 1870 to 1860, does not so largely exceed the percentage of increase as at the first glance would be supposed. I submit a table showing the progress:

Value of products of iron, cotton, and woolen goods, shown by the censuses.

Year.	Iron, pig.	Iron, rolled.	Iron, cast.	Cotton goods.	Woolen goods.
1830	$4,757,408	.....	.....	$22,534,815	$14,528,166
1840	7,172,575	.....	.....	46,350,433	20,696,999
1850	12,748,727	.....	$25,108,155	65,501,687	43,207,545
1860	29,870,120	$31,888,705	36,132,033	115,681,774	61,894,986
1870	69,640,498	120,311,158	99,843,248	177,489,739	155,405,358

The total production of iron other than pig was by the census of 1830 $21,494,654; 1840, $29,909,162; 1850, $60,455,653; 1860, $94,045,454.

RESULTS OF HIGH DUTIES.

Under the revenue duties of 1846 and 1857 there was a steady healthy growth and development of the manufacturing industries of the country. The exorbitant rates of the last fourteen years have increased their number and capacity for production above the wants and consumption of the country. For the last two years cotton and woolen mills have been running on half time, and many permanently suspended. Half of the furnaces of the country are out of blast. Mills and furnaces that never would have been built under revenue duties, because their location and facilities for procuring cheap raw material, labor, and transportation to market would render them unprofitable, have been started and must now be abandoned. Trade lags and industry ceases. The expectant shop-keeper vainly waits at the door-way for the passing customer. Closed shutters, silent furnaces and engines, and smokeless chimneys tell the condition of manufacture. Deserted wharfs, closed hatchways, and idle steamers and ships show business prostrate and commerce dead, failing merchants, starving mechanics, suspended mills, and rusting machinery. The bounties have been lavished in vain. The promises of protection for high wages to labor are a cheat and delusion, as well as to the farmer and mechanic.

DEPRESSION NOT FROM CONTRACTION.

These moving pictures of the distressed condition of the manufacturing regions of the country, of its silent work-shops, and idle and suffering laborers have been of late repeatedly held up for our contemplation. This condition is erroneously attributed to a supposed reduction of the currency for the resumption of specie payments. Contraction has wrought this ruin, say the advocates of paper money. Contraction! When? How? The total paper circulation is but $7,000,000 less than it was at the close of the year 1867. The paper in circulation, outside of the banks and Treasury, during the last ten years was at its lowest point in 1867, being $559,000,000, which was increased to $590,000,000 on January 1, 1872, and now is $5,000,000 in excess of the last amount.

To test this question, I requested the Treasurer to furnish me a statement from the Treasury books showing from 1865 to 1875 the total amount of United States notes, fractional currency and national-bank notes, and all other moneys issued and authorized to be issued as currency or bank reserve outstanding in the Treasury and national banks and in actual circulation. I will append it to my remarks. It proves unmistakably that in 1865 there was a redundancy of circulation which necessarily accumulated in the banks. Not being demanded to facilitate the exchanges, it lay idle in the banks and Treasury vaults. The latter held in 1865 $270,000,000, being over $100,000,000 more than they held in 1875, ten years later; and the banks held at least $100,000,000 more than the law required.

In December, 1867, there was in actual circulation among the people, outside of banks and Treasury vaults, but $559,000,000.

In the face of these facts no man can truthfully affirm that an imaginary contraction of circulation produced the collapse of the high prices of 1872 and the panic of 1873.

The panic of 1873 and subsequent depression resulted from other causes.

A transition from high prices for the products of industry entails reduced profits, lessened wages, uncertain employment, a glutted market, unsalable goods, needy borrowers, suspended business, enforced idleness, pecuniary distress, bankruptcy, and financial ruin to prudent managers as well as visionary adventurers.

Such transition occurred in 1873. The fall in prices gradually taking place after the rise during and subsequent to the war of the rebellion, which fall was most severe in 1869, was arrested by a sudden and unexpected European war, which disturbed the industries of the eastern continent.

The declaration of war between France and Germany in July, 1870, was followed by almost an immediate rise in the price of commodities. The demand for munitions of war, iron, food, clothing, advanced the price in foreign markets, and the prices went up in our own in sympathy. Nor did the conclusion of peace at once check the onward and upward march. The demand for the products of industry to repair the waste of war, the inflation of prices caused in Germany by the payment of the French war indemnity pushed commodities to estimated values too high for profitable consumption. Pig-iron, quoted in 1870 at $30 per ton, was worth in 1872 $50 to $55 per ton. Other metals and textile fabrics had advanced in sympathy. The manufacturing establishments, reaping enormous profits, were enlarged and multiplied. Their capacity in almost every branch of manufacturing industry was more than sufficient for the home demand for their products.

Then came the turn in the tide. The advancing price changed its current, receded, fell. On a falling market neither manufacturers nor merchants desired to buy. It is customers, not cash, that is lacking; and customers prefer to wait until the market has reached its proper condition and prices are at the old rate.

HOME MARKET A FAILURE.

In 1870 I affirmed that the high tariff had failed and would fail to give a market for our surplus. The excess of production above consumption in the Northwestern States for the year 1869 was estimated at seventy-four millions, of which twenty-eight millions had to seek a foreign market. The propositions to increase duties were defeated, although most of the war rates were continued. The six subsequent years have failed to give a better market. The last six years have tripled the surplus. In 1874 our grain-fields furnished bread to 20,000,000 workers in other countries glad to exchange their products for food. After supplying all our own people with food, in 1875 we shipped wheat and flour to fifteen millions offering us the cheapest products of their labor. They sent us for this food, which for the six years prior to the imposition of the present high-tariff rates our own home market consumed, all but an annual surplus of less than 17,000,000 bushels of wheat. During the last six years we have been compelled to find a market for an annual average surplus of 57,000,000 bushels of wheat. Fourteen years of heavy bounties to build up a home market has resulted in an increase of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat which our farmers must send abroad.

Great Britain and her dependencies buy annually $350,000,000 of American products. She cannot pay in gold, for, unlike the United States, she does not produce gold for export. She can and does produce cheaply iron, steel, cotton, and woolens. With these she pays for food, our grain, and provisions. Our surplus must be exchanged for her surplus directly or indirectly. Why forbid our farmers making so desirable an exchange? Must their produce be kept at home to depress prices and glut a food market amply supplied? Shall they let their fields lie waste and lessen food production, themselves engaging in manufacturing?

Of our grain export in 1875, 72,802,605 bushels of wheat and flour reduced to wheat was purchased by the people of the British Empire.

In 1873 Great Britain and Ireland gave us a market for our production valued as follows, calling a pound $5:

Cotton	$157,724,665
Grain	90,861,315
Provisions, tallow, &c	54,124,275
Tobacco	9,438,505
Other products	46,208,705
Total	357,357,465

For this we took of merchandise in exchange only $167,873,380, consisting of—

Iron, steel, and their manufactures	$43,998,455
Cotton and their manufactures	21,189,095
Linen and their manufactures	15,612,390
Woolen and worsted	30,576,106
Other commodities	56,587,235

The balance, amounting to $190,000,000, was settled for by bills on other nations, coin, or in other ways.

The United Kingdom bought of us over $300,000,000 of our agricultural productions. If we had refused to receive in part exchange the $111,000,000 of surplus iron, steel, and textile fabrics she offered and sold us, could we expect her people would continue to buy so largely of our farm products? Refusing to trade for her goods, she must take them to another food-producing country and our grain rot at home.

The total imports into Great Britain and Ireland of wheat and flour reduced to wheat in 1874 amounted to 91,069,027 bushels. Of this the United States sent direct 50,784,630 bushels, and through Canada at least 10,000,000 more. As the acreage of wheat grown for that year in the United Kingdom was 3,830,676 acres, probably one-half of the bread consumed by the people of the British Isles was imported, and one-third came from the United States.

Great Britain is the best customer of the western wheat-grower, and the most certain market for our surplus provisions. Her own grain feeds only her own farmers and country district. The United States supplies her cities and manufactories—fully one-half of her people—with provisions and bread.

Of a total import of 33,028,100 bushels of corn, 25,115,200 bushels came from the United States.

I ask for a reduction of duty because the only meritorious plea for protection is that infant industries need and are entitled to national aid. It is the old, old story. We heard it in childhood. It was the excuse, if not the justification, for the high duty of 7½ per cent. in the first revenue bill passed by the First Congress in 1780. The next generation heard the same song at the close of the war of 1812. Even then, however, this principle, ever to be remembered, was conceded.

PROTECTION SHOULD NOT BE PERMANENT NOR PROHIBITORY.

It was sixty years ago that the manufacturers of cottons and woolens, not content with then existing rates, came to Congress with petitions for higher duties. Mr. Newton, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, reported upon them favorably, promising that "should the National Government, pursuing an enlightened and liberal policy, sustain and foster the manufacturing establishments, a few years would place them in a condition to bid defiance to foreign competition." This was in 1816. The infants then begging for Government bounty, according to the report of the committee, had grown to the following proportions:

	Woolen.	Cotton.
Capital	$12,000,000	$40,000,000
Persons employed	100,000	100,000
Wages paid	.....	$15,000,000
Value of product	$19,000,000	$24,300,000

These manufactures had sprung into life under a duty of but 12½ per cent. ad valorem. The tariff law of 1816 increased the duty to 25 per cent.; but keeping in view the fact that permanent protection was not to be conceded, the duty was to be reduced to 20 per cent. at the expiration of three years.

When the bill was under discussion Mr. Webster moved to reduce the duty on imported iron from 75 to 45 cents per hundred-weight; it was advocated by him and carried—ayes 62, noes 43.

Mr. Webster, then representing New Hampshire, said the question was how far the General Government was bound to support those institutions, (manufactories.) He was not prepared to say that the Government was bound to adopt a permanent protection. He proposed a duty on cottons of 30 per cent. ad valorem for two years; 25 per cent. for two years thereafter, and 20 per cent. after the last period. He stated the object of his motion was to impose a duty so moderate as to insure its permanency and still be an adequate one. (Annals of Congress, Fourteenth Congress, first session, page 1271.)

Manufacturers themselves only claimed temporary protection. Said one of their advocates in 1849:

> Grant to our manufacturers in a permanent and specific form that protection which the act of 1846 delusively promised, say $13 on bar iron and $5.50 on pig, and they will be enabled to furnish a better and cheaper article than can be imported, and they will render the country independent of foreign aid in the supply of this important material.—Letter of J. S. Home to the Secretary of the Treasury 1849-'50. Hon. William Meredith, Secretary of the Treasury, executive document, first session Thirty-first Congress, page 859.

It was recognized as a true principle and enacted into law in the compromise tariff of 1832, which provided for a biennial reduction of tariff rates until at the end of nine years the maximum duty of 20 per cent. was reached. For this tariff Henry Clay voted, and by his influence and efforts it was passed.

The reductions of 1846 and 1856 were based upon the same doctrine that protective duties ought not to be permanent, and that as industries are established bounty should be gradually withdrawn.

The passage of the committee's bill will apparently result in a reduction of customs revenue. The reduction for the next and ensuing year will be greater.

The heaviest importations of dutiable articles are of iron, cottons, woolens, silks, and sugar. The domestic production is increasing, except of sugar. The manufacturing establishments of iron, cottons, and of many woolen goods are of more than sufficient capacity to supply the home demand. The depressed condition of business, with labor unemployed and poorly rewarded, the decrease of extravagance, with greater frugality and economy, must continue to lessen the consumption of commodities and their importation. Customs revenues will probably grow smaller for some years. They are now diminishing.

The importations of dutiable commodities and duties received for the last three years have been—

Importation of duitable commodities for 1873, 1874, and 1875.

Years.	Dutiable imports.	Duties.
1873	$497,320,326	$188,089,522 70
1874	415,924,580	163,103,833 69
1875	386,725,509	157,167,722 35

The falling off in duties and imports has continued during the present fiscal year. A comparison of the first months of 1875 and 1876 shows a certain deficit in the customs-revenue receipts:

Nine months of—	Dutiable imports.	Duties.
1875	$286,447,171	$119,100,872 31
1876	243,150,785	113,969,596 26

The diminution of customs revenues for nine months of 1876 below same period of 1875, $5,031,276.05. A proportionate reduction for the remaining three months will make the total falling off in duties $6,841,701.40.

The total Treasury receipts up to May 1 show an increase for the last ten months above the same period in 1875, although the customs revenue fell still more heavily in April.

Total Treasury receipts up to May 1.

	Customs.	Internal revenue.	Total revenues.
Ten months, 1875	$134,719,010 20	$90,911,041 05	$241,259,677 11
Ten months, 1876	125,256,199 79	92,418,744 41	244,853,000 11
May and June, 1875	22,448,712 15	20,096,452 53	46,740,373 99
Total, 1875	157,167,722 35	110,007,493 58	288,000,051 10
Estimated total, 1876	147,704,911,94	112,515,196,94	291,593,374 10
Decrease	9,462,810 41
Increase		2,507,703 36	3,593,723 00

Thus, while there will probably be an increase in receipts from internal revenue of $3,000,000 in 1876 above 1875 and no falling off in total receipts from all sources, the customs revenue still continues to decline. The internal revenue and miscellaneous receipts for the present year have made up for the decline in customs. But the miscellaneous receipts are uncertain, being made up in part from premiums on sale of coin, sale of public lands, &c. Under the most favorable exhibit the revenues of 1877 will not rise above those of 1875, which fell short of meeting the expenditures and requirements of the sinking fund.

REDUCTION WILL POSTPONE RESUMPTION.

This to me is a weighty reason for opposing a reduction of revenue. The country desires ultimately to return to specie payment. Without coin in the Treasury and sufficient revenues there can be neither redemption nor resumption. The Treasury cannot accumulate or retain coin for resumption without a surplus revenue. A reduction of $12,000,000, as proposed by the bill, and the decline of importations would reduce customs revenues next year probably $20,000,000. This, unless compensated by an increase of revenue from other sources, will be an effectual postponement of any practical plan of ultimate specie resumption.

TAXATION NOT REVENUE TO BE REDUCED.

The obligations of the Government must be sacredly met. Sufficient revenue for necessary economical expenditures and for the interest and sinking-fund account of the public debt must be raised.

The Government credit is to-day higher than ever before when negotiating for public loans. Its 5 per cent. bonds, having five years only to run, sold, on the 24th of last month, at a premium of 3¼ per cent., showing a 4½ per cent. interest bond for the same time to be worth above par. The national credit must be kept at that or made still better.

There are outstanding and now payable at the option of the Government approximately $740,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds, while in five years more, at the option of the Government upon the remainder of the bonded debt, nearly $1,000,000,000 will have matured. Under the administration of General Grant $500,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds have been refunded into 5 per cent. ten-year bonds. The public credit stands to-day nearly at 4 per cent. In the observance of the sinking-fund law, said an eminent banker, Mr. Hatch, to the Committee of Ways and Means, "was the beginning of the elevation of our Government credit all over the world."

In the next twelve years the whole amount, $1,000,000,000, of outstanding 6 per cent. bonds will have matured absolutely. The sinking fund at that time will be insufficient by $400,000,000 to redeem them, and at least that amount of 6 per cent. bonds must be refunded. They ought, they can in a short time be refunded at 4 per cent., and save $20,000,000 in annual interest, if the national credit is maintained at its present high standard. Common honesty, national honor, and the wisest statesmanship unite in demanding sufficient revenues to meet the requirements of the sinking fund.

One year ago as decreasing revenues resulting from diminished importations threatened to exhaust the balance that should be applied to the sinking-fund account, Congress considered it a sacred duty to provide additional revenues, and passed an act to further protect the sinking fund. It contained provisions that diminished instead of increased revenue on imported articles. But in other respects it accomplished what its title proposed. It provided for a threatened deficit in the sinking fund and thereby greatly improved the public credit.

Before the sinking-fund account will have wiped out the debt the nation, at its present rate of growth, will have doubled in population and tripled in wealth. The annual burden for interest and principal will, in the year 1900, twenty-four years hence, be borne by 75,000,000 of people and the per capita proportion be reduced nearly one-half. As the sinking-fund account must annually increase by the amount of interest on the annual payment, a fear has been expressed of the inability of the people to meet the supposed increased annual payments required thereby for the public debt. The fact is overlooked that the interest accruing on the principal of the debt unpaid is diminished annually by just the amount added to the sinking-fund account. The total annual payment for interest and sinking-fund account remains nearly the same.

If it is proposed to repudiate the sinking-fund pledge, do not let us begin in the centennial year. If the nation while exhausted and bleeding from the terrible life-struggle of a fierce civil war could raise in 1866 from customs and internal taxation nearly $500,000,000 and in 1867 $442,000,000, it can hereafter, with increased production and the waste of war repaired, without embarrassment raise $130,000,000 for interest and the sinking fund, besides the amount necessary for its ordinary expenditures.

During the delivery of the foregoing speech,

Mr. FAULKNER (at two o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) said: I believe that the two hours assigned for this discussion by the House have now expired, and I move that the committee rise.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I cannot yield for that motion during my hour.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WIKE.) The time to which the debate was limited has expired.

Mr. FAULKNER. The House assigned two hours for the discussion of this bill in Committee of the Whole, and that time has now expired.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will allow me to finish my remarks. I do not think I shall ask an extension of time beyond my hour.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I certainly hope the motion that the committee rise will not be insisted upon. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] who preceded the gentleman now occupying the floor had his time extended.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is the gentleman aware that the House by its positive order fixed the time which should be allowed for this debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that the time to which the debate was limited by the House has expired, and can only be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. My hour has not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. But the two hours to which the debate was limited have expired; and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] moves that the committee rise in pursuance of the order of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will be entitled to the floor for the remainder of his hour when the House again goes into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKNER. I hope unanimous consent will be given for the gentleman to conclude now.

Mr. KELLEY. If the committee should now rise and I should be recognized in the House I will move that the time be extended so as to allow the gentleman from Illinois to finish his speech now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be permitted to complete his remarks at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. FAULKNER. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee refuses to rise, and the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not propose to interrupt the gentleman's speech at all; but as the committee has declined to rise pursuant to the order of the House, I wish to inquire how long it will be compelled to sit. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That the Chair presumes will be at the pleasure of the committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise to a question of order. Is it competent for the Committee of the Whole to extend the time for discussion contrary to the order of the House?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. SPRINGER having resumed the chair.) It is competent for the Committee of the Whole to rise at any time; but it has refused to rise; and the gentleman from Illinois has now the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is he entitled to the floor for further discussion when the time to which the House positively limited debate has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order; the gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, resumed his remarks. When his hour had expired, but before he had concluded his speech,

Mr. FAULKNER moved that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I trust the gentleman from Illinois may be allowed to conclude his speech. His colleague [Mr. MORRISON] had his time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to proceed with his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. FAULKNER. I insist on the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Illinois proceeding with his remarks. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, resumed and concluded his speech, as already given.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 3132) to revise and simplify existing laws imposing duties on imports and to reduce taxation, had come to no resolution thereon.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. COX, Mr. WIKE, and Mr. KASSON as the committee of conference on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2441) authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, &c.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Last evening at the adjournment the House had under consideration the election case of Spencer vs. Morey, from the State of Louisiana. This morning, soon after the reading of the Journal, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] moved to postpone the unfinished business for two hours. That time having expired, I now propose to proceed with the consideration of that case; and I yield the floor to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] rise?

Mr. FAULKNER. I rise for the purpose of moving the postponement of the contested-election case of Spencer vs. Morey coming over from yesterday for two hours to enable the Committee on Foreign Affairs to make a unanimous report and such as they have been authorized by a suspension of the rules of the House to make on this day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the House will proceed with the Louisiana contested-election case pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia, by order of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moves that the House further postpone the consideration of the business of yesterday for two hours in order that it may proceed to the consideration of the report of that committee in the case of the investigation into the conduct of the minister of this country to Great Britain.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in print?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope, then, we will have time to consider it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I demand a division on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia, and I hope we will be allowed to proceed with the contested-election case from Louisiana and have a vote upon it to-day.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 57.

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced the passage by that body of an act (H. R. No. 755) for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells without amendment.

It further announced the passage of an act (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis, Kuner, Zisemann & Zott, Kuner & Zott, all of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Nachtrieb & Co., of Galion, Ohio, with amendments, in which concurrence was requested.

THE EMMA MINE.

The SPEAKER. The further consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday is postponed for two hours, and the gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FAULKNER. I yield the floor to my colleague on the committee from the State of New York [Mr. HEWITT] to submit the report in the case of the Emma Mine.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous vote of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I present the following report and the evidence taken in the case under the resolution of the House to investigate the connection of General Robert E. Schenck, minister to the court of Saint James, with the Emma Mine.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the report.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will interrupt the reading of the report to make a single suggestion. The report is evidently a long one and the Clerk is reading from manuscript. I understand the gentleman from New York in charge of the matter desires to make a speech, and I therefore suggest the further reading of the report be suspended with the exception of the reading of the conclusions at which the committee have arrived, and then the gentleman can go on and make his speech, if he desires to do so. Afterward the report can be ordered to be printed, so the House before taking action can have the whole report before it as well as the gentleman's speech. That will be, I think, fairer to all concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX in the chair.) Is there objection to that suggestion?

Mr. WALLING. Yes; I object, as the House wishes to hear the report, and I object to passing it over without reading.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I venture to suggest, as the report is really very long——

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Of course it is not expected it can receive the undivided attention of the House, and it seems to me the object will be gained by allowing it to be printed, only reading the conclusions of the committee, and upon that the debate may take place.

Mr. WALLING. I do not desire to take the time of the House unnecessarily in reading the report, but if we are to vote on the resolutions which are the conclusions of the committee, the House should be placed in possession of the information to enable us to arrive at a correct vote, and we cannot do so without hearing the report read in full.

Mr. GARFIELD. I made my suggestion with the expectation as a matter of course the committee will not on so grave a subject as this compel us to vote until we have seen in print the report which they have made. I take it the gentleman from New York will not expect us to come to a vote on the mere reading of the report. That seems to me would not be anybody's opinion of fair play. In order to save time let the conclusion of the report be read, and then let the report be printed. Let the gentleman make his speech, and when the rest of us see it in print, at some subsequent day, we can come to a vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am informed that the gentleman from New York who has charge of this matter does not desire to press it to a final vote to-night, and there can be no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the report be printed in the RECORD, and only the conclusions read from the Clerk's desk at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on his objection?

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman upon whom reflection is made by this report, I understand, is a constituent of mine at the present time, and I hope so important a matter as this will not be brought in to be acted on upon the mere reading of the report. Here is the testimony, as I understand it, contained in about eight hundred printed pages. I have had no opportunity to look fairly into it, nor have other members of the House, and I should like to see it. If the gentleman will say he will move to recommit it with leave to report at any time, we will have no objection to the report being printed, and to his making his speech now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. There is no desire on the part of the committee to bring this to a vote to-day, unless every member of the House is prepared to vote upon it. On the contrary, while it is a unanimous report, it is the unanimous wish of the committee that every opportunity shall be given to the members of this House to read the report, to comprehend the findings, and to vote intelligently. And the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio will be cheerfully accepted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the report will be printed at length in the RECORD; and it is the understanding that no vote shall be taken to-night.

Mr. McMAHON. With that understanding I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the conclusion of the report.

The Clerk read the concluding portion of the report, which in full is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs respectfully beg leave to submit the following report:

On the 28th day of February, 1876, the House adopted a resolution in the following words, (page 1:)

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized and instructed to inquire further into the connection of the United States minister at the Court of St. James with the Emma Mine, so called; that it have power to send for persons and papers; and leave is given to said committee to sit during the sessions of the House."

The correspondence which had taken place in reference to this subject between the Secretary of State and General Robert C. Schenck, the minister of the United States at the Court of St. James, and the communication of the Secretary of State accompanying the correspondence, had been previously referred back by the House to the committee for further consideration. (pages 4-9.)

This correspondence developed the fact that in the month of November, 1871, the American minister at the Court of St. James had become a stockholder and a director of the Emma Silver Mining Company of London, a corporation formed in Great Britain, the country to which he was accredited, for the purchase of a mine in the United States, which he represented as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. So far as the committee have been able to ascertain, (and they believe it to be true,) this is the first occasion in which a diplomatic representative of the Government of the United States has allowed himself to become associated, while acting as minister, in a private enterprise, carried on in his own country, but offered for sale in the country to which he is accredited. The questions presented, therefore, for inquiry and consideration are as follows:

1. Whether it is proper for an American minister to allow the use of his name, and consequently of his official position, for the two cannot be separated, to further the sale of American property in the open markets of the country to which he is accredited.

2. Whether his relations to the vendors of the property have been such as to cast suspicion upon his motives, and subject his action to unfavorable criticism.

3. Whether his subsequent action in connection with the company, or its shares, by dealing in them or otherwise, is compatible with the proper exercise of his diplomatic functions and the maintenance of a position of honor and usefulness at his post of duty.

If the committee are right in their view of the inquiry submitted to them, it will be seen that the question of the real value of the Emma Mine has no special bearing upon the conclusions to be reached. They have, however, felt themselves compelled to take a large amount of testimony on this subject, because evidence bearing upon that point had been taken prior to the arrival of General Schenck, who therefore insisted that it was necessary for his defense and vindication that further testimony should be taken, and they were unwilling to deny to a man so long and eminent in the public service any privilege which he might feel disposed to claim. He has therefore had full liberty to produce evidence giving the whole history of the enterprise, and the result is the volume of eight hundred and seventy-nine printed pages, which is herewith submitted to the House as part of this report.

From this mass of evidence, it appears that in the month of April, 1871, Trenor W. Park and Henry H. Baxter, both American citizens, purchased one-half interest in the Emma Silver Mine, situated in the Territory of Utah, for the sum of $375,000, and subsequently one-sixteenth interest at the rate of $1,500,000 for the whole mine, subject however to the claim then in litigation of James E. Lyon, of Wisconsin, for one-third of the property, (page 463.) In this litigation Lyon was represented, as counsel, by William M. Stewart, then a Senator of the United States from the State of Nevada. In August, 1871, an agreement was made between the owners of the Emma Mine and Stewart, acting as the attorney for Lyon, in pursuance of which it was agreed that the property should be offered for sale and (page 51) the claim of Lyon finally adjusted; but it was expected and represented that the amount likely to accrue to Lyon would be $500,000, as will appear from the annexed letter, which Stewart sent to Lyon at the time:

NEW YORK, August 5, 1871.

FRIEND LYON: Hillyer will start in about twenty minutes. He will explain to you the arrangement; it is not as good as I tried to get, but after three days of talk it was the best I could get. The plan has this advantage, that we will not be fighting for a worked-out mine. The litigation will not be injured, and, if we gain the case, we shall recover something, besides the right to bring other lawsuits. They have worked the mine up so in England by the ore they have sent, and the manner of sending it, that I have no doubt of a sale from five to eight millions.

I have seen their correspondence with the two English houses to whom they sent the ore. They are crazy about the mine. The Emma party have been working all the time to put up the reputation of the mine. I have refused to give up the lawsuit under any circumstances unless you get $500,000. You will, without doubt, get that.

WM. M. STEWART.

Stewart's personal interest in the mattter was to be one-fourth of the amount which might be realized by Lyon. In September, Park, representing the owners of the mine, and Stewart, representing Lyon, sailed for England for the purpose of selling the property. The evidence shows that during the summer and up to this time extraordinary efforts had been made to produce a large yield of ore from the mine, and that the product of the four months from 1st May to 1st September (page 672) was much larger than it had ever been before or ever was afterward. All the rich ore produced was forwarded by steamers to England and there sold, and the large yield and value of the ore were well known to the mining world.

On their arrival in London, (pages 464, 465,) they were met by C. M. Fisher, an American lawyer, who it is testified had done a good deal of legal business for the American legation, and whom General Schenck had known in London prior to his appointment as minister.

Fisher introduced Park and Stewart to Coates & Hankey as a firm desirous to purchase the property. A contingent arrangement was made with this firm, which subsequently fell through, but resulted in the introduction by them of Park and Stewart to Albert Grant, of the firm of Grant & Co., of London, well known for their success in bringing out, or "floating," as it is called, new companies upon the English market. After some negotiation, covering the month of October, 1871, Albert Grant agreed to take up the enterprise, for reasons which he has given to the public in a circular dated January 5, 1876, which appears in full in the statement of Albert Grant attached to the evidence herewith submitted, (page 31.) In this statement he says, after referring to the report of Professor Silliman, also included in the evidence:

"Being thoroughly satisfied with this report, I made an arrangement with Messrs. Park and Stewart to aid them with my influence in obtaining the capital necessary to enable the company to acquire it, the price they required for the mine being one million stering, half of which they stipulated to take in shares of the company.

"In addition to the evidences of bona fides before referred to, Mr. Park informed me he had reason to hope and believe that the American minister, General Schenck, would, if requested, join the board of directors; adding that he knew something of the property, and was disposed to invest some considerable amount in its shares, and Mr. Park asked me whether this fact would be favorably looked upon. I told him that it would be very satisfactory to every one about to be connected with the company, and especially to myself, as, I added, I felt certain it would inspire confidence in the undertaking, as, from the well known honorable character of the American minister, it was not to be supposed for a moment that he would have lent the weight of his name, given in addition to the influence of his official position, to an undertaking in the good faith of which he did not implicitly believe.

"This proposal for General Schenck to join the board was conclusive to me, as it would have been to anybody else, however cautious or experienced, as to the entire trustworthiness as an honorable man of Professor Silliman; of the good faith and respectability of Messrs. Park and Stewart, who were themselves to join the board, and, as I believed, entirely covering any moral responsibility I might assume in using the influence of my position to assist the vendors in obtaining the capital for the company. That was my fixed opinion then; it is not less my fixed opinion now."

It will thus be seen that Albert Grant alleges that he was induced to undertake "to float" the company upon the English market because the American minister had agreed "to join the board of directors" and to lend "the weight of his name, given in addition to the influence of his official position," to the undertaking. The evidence goes to show also clearly, but not of course absolutely, that no one else but Grant & Co. could have successfully sold a mine at that time in the English market, which was not then favorable for the sale of mining property. Park, however, swears that the arrangement with Grant was verbally completed before he applied to General Schenck to become a director, although he had previously agreed to take stock; but he admits that the contract with Grant & Co. was not signed until after he had procured the consent of General Schenck to join the board of directors. It would seem therefore that Grant is sustained in his statement that he did not finally decide to engage in the enterprise until he had satisfactory assurances that Schenck would become a director.

The contract with Grant & Co. is given at length in the evidence, (page 252.) It provides that the property shall be capitalized at £1,000,000, half of which is to be offered to the public at par in twenty-pound shares, and the other half of the shares are to be retained by the vendors for nine months, unless Grant & Co. should consent to their sale at an earlier date. Grant & Co. were to receive as compensation for "promoting" the company 20 per cent., equal to £100,000, on the sale of the first half of the shares, and one-half of the profits realized upon the sale of the second half retained by the vendors. Grant & Co. were authorized to "sustain the market" pending the allotment by the purchase of shares at a premium for the account of the vendors.

Thereupon a prospectus, dated November 9, 1871, (pages 69-74,) was issued, inviting proposals for the stock from the public until the 16th November, when it appears that shares were applied for largely in excess of the whole number advertised to be sold. This prospectus contains a list of directors, among which is the name of "Major-General Robert C. Schenck, United States minister, London," and in the body of the prospectus occurs the following paragraph:

"Major-General Schenck, on account of the exceptional character of the undertaking, has consented to act as one of the directors."

The prospectus contains a very full statement of the property sold and the resources in hand available for cash dividends, affirming that these are sufficient to warrant cash dividends at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month for twelve months.

In addition to these resources, the prospectus asserts that "the mine includes about 13,250 tons of first-class ore, already developed in various parts of the mine, and described in Professor Silliman's report of the estimated net value of £357,750."

The prospectus then states:

"From the above arrangements and details will be seen the extraordinary character of the property that will be acquired by the company, and in what a totally different character the Emma Mine stands to almost every mine in which the public have been allowed to participate by subscription."

For this statement every director, including the American minister, was responsible, so far as his character and judgment were concerned.

If this statement had been true, then the resources "already developed" were sufficient for two years' additional dividends at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum, thus securing from both sources to the stockholders 54 per cent. of the purchase-money, without any further product whatever beyond the reserves already developed.

The evidence shows (page 696) that dividends at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month were paid for thirteen months consecutively, until December, 1872, since when no dividends have been earned or paid, and there is no money on hand out of which they can be paid, and there is no ore in sight which can be mined, all the ore in the old workings having been absolutely exhausted, and no new ore developed by the subsequent explorations. Of the dividends paid £36,000 were advanced on sales of ore by Mr. Park, (pages 554, 656,) who is now suing the company for a balance of about £25,000 thereof, so that the net amount of earnings actually divided was £170,000.

On inquiry by the committee, Mr. Park professed his inability to account for the disappearance of the reserves, alleging as a reason that he had been refused access to the mine, and no satisfactory (page 657) evidence was presented to the committee as to what had become of the remainder of the available resources, estimated in the prospectus to be of the total value of £539,050, or of the large quantity of ore which ought to have been found during the years 1872 and 1873, during which mining operations were steadily prosecuted.

The result is that the shares have greatly depreciated in value, having fallen from £32 per share, at which they were sold May 11, 1872, to £1 5s., at which they are now quoted. The mine itself is still in the possession of the company, but the personal property has all been sold under execution issued in favor of Mr. Park, and has been purchased by him, and is now in his possession. Great losses and consequent distress have thus fallen upon a large number of innocent people who, believing in these representations, had subscribed for the shares; and probably no failure of recent date has caused more general denunciation and brought more odium to its authors than this unfortunate enterprise.

Such briefly is the skeleton history of the Emma Silver-Mining Company of London, as developed by the evidence submitted to the committee.

The history of General Schenck's connection with this company, as disclosed by the evidence, would appear to be as follows:

About the middle of October, 1871, (pages 281-286) General Schenck made the acquaintance of Park, in company with Stewart, whom he had previously well known in the United States. The object of their visit to England was mentioned, and a conversation ensued upon the subject, which led Stewart to suggest to General Schenck that he should purchase shares in the company about to be formed. On Schenck's reply that he had no means to invest, Stewart suggested that "Park, owning a great many of the shares, and being a man of wealth, could assist him if he was so disposed;" and accordingly Park proposed to Schenck that he should become a subscriber in the company about to be formed to the extent of five hundred shares, of the value at cost of £10,000, with the understanding that General Schenck would not be required to provide any money, but that Park would let him have the amount for one year without interest. As a further inducement for General Schenck to take the stock, Park guaranteed that the dividends thereon should amount to 2 per cent. per month while held by said Schenck, and that he would at any time, on the request of Schenck, take back the shares at the par value thereof. It was further provided that Park might relieve himself from this guarantee at any time by offering to take back the shares at their par value, (see documents, page 280.) The practical result of this agreement was to give to General Schenck a bonus (page 647) of 24 per cent. on the stock subscribed by him, because the note which he gave in payment for the stock was made payable in one year and bore no interest. By a subsequent arrangement, the dividends guaranteed were reduced to 1½ per cent., thus reducing the bonus to 18 per cent. on the amount of the purchase. In addition to the note given in accordance with this agreement, Schenck also agreed to assign to Park, as security for the payment of the note, four hundred and seventy-five shares of the said stock, and, if required by said Park, to give him a mortgage on certain real estate in the city of Washington; but the stock was not so assigned, and the mortgage was never given for any such purpose, although it was subsequently given to secure a loan of $15,000 made in 1874 by Park to Schenck.

It is to be observed that the note, the guarantee of Park to Schenck, and the stipulation for security from Schenck to Park, all bear date upon the same day, November 1, 1871, and Park and Schenck both swear that they were executed on the day they were dated. Lyon, on the other hand, swears that Park told him that the note and the papers were signed at a subsequent date after the report reached London of the introduction of a resolution of inquiry into the Senate of the United States. The committee merely call attention to the fact that while Schenck purchased five hundred shares of stock, he only agreed to assign four hundred and seventy-five shares to Park as security, leaving twenty-five shares unassigned; these twenty-five shares were sold by General Schenck, as an act of personal friendship, to Mrs. Fannie Bates, then residing in Paris. The date of this sale (page 292) is on the 1st of January, 1872, and the money arising from it, £500, is indorsed upon Schenck's note to Park on the 8th of January, 1872; and the actual transfer of the stock to Mrs. Bates appears to have been made on the 31st of January, 1872. Now, if the documents between Park and Schenck were really signed on the 1st of November, 1871, then General Schenck must have had an understanding with Mrs. Bates prior to that date that she was to have twenty-five shares of stock. Of this there is no evidence whatever, and considering that the contract, (to use General Schenck's language,) "was made on the last days of October, reduced to writing and closed on the 1st day of November; that no company had yet been formed," it raises a strong doubt as to whether all the papers were executed upon the day when they bear date. The probability would rather be, though it may have been forgotten by General Schenck, that the note and the guarantee of Park were first executed, and the stipulation of Schenck to give security was executed at a later date. This view is confirmed by the letter of resignation of General Schenck, dated December 6, in which he says: "I still hold all the shares I have been able to take;" and by the statement of his counsel, (page 17,) speaking of the resignation on the 6th of December: "He retained his original shares, with the exception of twenty-five shares, soon afterward disposed of to a friend." It is also to be observed that the note was not stamped, an omission which neither Park nor General Schenck appear to have observed. The suggestion that General Schenck should become a director of the company is said by him to have been made either by Stewart or Park within a day or two after the execution of these papers. Stewart says that the proposition was made in the following language, (page 161:) "General, why cannot you be one of the directors? They have a salary connected with each directorship; it is $2,500 a year; that will be worth something to you, and you will have plenty of time to attend to it." Schenck replied: "I have not thought of doing any such thing as that, but I will think about it." On page 162, Stewart says that the only "consideration we suggested in connection with it was the salary he would get if he became a director, that is $2,500, which the rest of them were to receive."

Schenck and Park do not appear to remember that the salary argument was used. Schenck says, (page 281:)

"Arguments were presented to me why I should be a manager. It was stated that Park and Stewart and Mr. Baxter would be American directors, but that they wanted somebody that would be in London, who was an American, to represent, and, in some sense, if need be, to protect, American interests. That seemed to be a very plausible reason, but I still objected, and I placed my objection first upon the ground that I doubted the propriety of my having anything to do with the management of a company while I was there in a representative capacity, and that I certainly should not have anything to do with it unless I should first be satisfied that there were precedents for anything of that kind, or that it was not deemed proper by some persons whom I might consult upon the subject, and whose judgment might help to influence mine."

General Schenck did not consult the Secretary of State on the subject, but says (page 282) that he made inquiry of Mr. Moran, the secretary of legation; but Mr. Moran does not appear to have given any opinion as to the propriety of the American minister becoming a director in the Emma Mining Company, but only as to the character and standing of the English gentlemen to be associated in the direction. General Schenck's scruples appear to have been removed by the fact that the Duke of Saldanha, the Portuguese minister resident in London, was advertised as a director in a prospectus offering for sale the shares of the "Lisbon Tramway Company." This was one of the companies "floated" by Albert Grant, and was for the sale of a concession made to the Duke of Saldanha himself. As this prospectus was published on the 7th of July, 1871, these facts might have readily been ascertained, (page 283.)

Mr. Park's statement as to the motives which induced him to urge General Schenck to become a director are given on page 646, as follows:

"I wanted to assist General Schenck, to be friendly with him, and I wanted to have his name connected with it. I wanted to have somebody in England on whom I could rely, and with whom I could correspond, and who would hold a large interest in it. He said that if he took the stock he would hold it as an investment. I was a total stranger in London when I went there, and I did not want to go away, leaving no American behind me who was interested in the mine to look after my interest.

"Question. Did not you consider it a very desirable thing to have the American minister a director in the company?

"Answer. I did.

"Q. Did you not, therefore, make to him the proposition to take stock on terms which you did not offer to any one else?

"A. I did not make any offer to anybody else.

"Q. What was your motive in offering him better terms than anybody else got?

"A. Because I wanted him in the company for reasons I have given.

"Q. Because he was the American minister?

"A. Not solely for that.

"Q. That was one element in it?

"A. That was one element in it, of course. He was not only an honest man, but a prominent man, a man who was well known, who was prominently connected with the Government for many years and who is now known as the American minister. His name connected with any enterprise would, of course, add strength to it. There is no doubt about that. But I deny that that was my sole purpose. This is not the first instance of my doing the same thing. I could name numerous instances where I did the same thing with other parties, but not in the Emma Mine."

The reasonable conclusion from this evidence is that it was deemed by Park and Stewart most important to identify the American minister with the sale and management of the company, and that inducements were held out to him to secure his consent to become a stockholder which were not offered to any other director. There is nothing, however, in the evidence to show that General Schenck knew or suspected that any fraud was intended or about to be perpetrated upon the public, or that his official position was to be used to insure the successful perpetration of a fraud, if any were intended. On the contrary, all the evidence goes to show that he had formed the most favorable opinion of the mine and had absolute faith in its value; and indeed it is impossible to believe, under any circumstances however suspicious, that a man of General Schenck's eminent position would deliberately lend himself to the sale of a "worked-out" mine at a fictitious value, when the discovery of its worthlessness must follow so soon upon the heels of the authors of the fraud and consign him to everlasting infamy. But to a man of less confiding nature the offer to sell the stock upon credit without the payment of any money, the guarantee of high dividends without the payment of any interest on the loan, the indemnity against ultimate loss by agreeing to take back the stock at any time at par, ought to have put him on his guard against the dangers of a connection with associates who made such tempting and such unusual offers.

Moreover, a more critical examination of the documents which were submitted to him would have enabled him to have discovered a discrepancy which should have kept him from giving the weight of his name to the prospectus in which he appeared as the American minister.

In the statement by Mr. Park to Coates and Hankey at the time when General Schenck's attention was first directed to the property (page 468) occurs the following item: "Profit on 5,638 tons produced by present owners (who purchased April 25, 1871) up to September 1, 1871, £158,268," or at the rate of £450,200 per annum.

In the prospectus, (page 71,) in which General Schenck's name appears as a director, is the following paragraph:

"Net amount produced: Total estimated net yield of mine from 1st May to 1st September, equal to four months' working, £231,059, or at the rate of nearly £700,000 per annum."

It is probable that General Schenck's attention was not attracted to this discrepancy; but it serves to show the danger of a departure by a public officer from the legitimate sphere of his official duties into the region of private business and speculation.

General Schenck testifies that he had doubts as to the propriety of identifying himself with a commercial or speculative company; but it does not seem to have occurred to him that these doubts could have been resolved without risk to his character and official position by referring to the standard authorities on international law, or to his colleagues in the diplomatic corps, or by consulting his Government at home, from whom he could have had an answer within twenty-four hours; but he seems rather to have listened to the seductive arguments of those immediately about him, more concerned for their own profit than for his reputation, and holding out inducements to him which should have made him doubly cautious as to the nature of his decision.

Having thus placed himself in a false position with his own Government by identifying himself with a private enterprise in regard to which he himself had grave scruples, without consultation with the Secretary of State, and having accepted pecuniary favors from the vendors of the property, which disqualified him on moral grounds from assuming the duties of a trustee, he nevertheless did, in advance of the sale of the stock, become a director of the proposed company, and therefore, as the agent of the vendors, joined in the invitation to the public to subscribe for its shares, (pages 312, 313,) without informing the subscribers that his dividends had been guaranteed to him, and that his shares had been procured by previous arrangement, without any risk of loss to himself, from the fact that one of the vendors had agreed to take the shares off his hands at any time at their original cost. He thus placed himself in a further false position with the public, for the reason that he could make a profit only by the successful issue of the shares, whether they should prove permanently valuable or not, while the public were sure to make a loss in case the representations of the prospectus should prove to be fallacious, while he could make no loss. He was in fact in the position not merely of a vendor, refraining from the publication of facts which might have been important for the buyer to know, but of a trustee bound by the obligations of his trust to inform those for whom he proposed to act of his true position in reference to the enterprise.

In the recent case of Tooke vs. McDougall, as reported in the London Daily Telegraph May 3, 1876, having reference to the Emma Mine, Mr. Justice Grove uses the following language upon this point:

"He could not understand with what justice, unless, by a public and open vote of the company, money was given to the directors, that money or shares should be given to persons in order to induce them to be directors, and to let their names be exhibited upon the prospectus. He did not consider this a proper thing, though he believed it was frequently done by men who were called honorable. The reason why the public attached faith to the names of directors was that they were led to believe that they were men who had invested their own money in the concern and were persons upon whose judgment and position reliance could be placed; but, if the directors had had their qualifications found for them, then the transaction was not a real one, and any faith which the public might attach to the names of the directors would be misplaced."

Throughout all his testimony General Schenck seemed to be perfectly unconscious (page 313) of the impropriety of this action, and seemed to regard it as a matter purely personal to himself and Mr. Park, in which the other shareholders and directors could have no concern; but when it is remembered that the name of the American minister is not only put forth in the prospectus as a director, but as a voucher of the "exceptional character" of the property, and that according to his own statement it is manifest he subscribed publicly for £10,000 of the stock, apparently upon the same terms as the other subscribers, but in reality upon a private arrangement previously made with the vendors, in which he put no money at risk, and was absolutely guaranteed against loss, it cannot be denied that he occupied a position which cannot be defended. It is no answer to this statement that General Schenck did in reality lose money by the operation. If he did so, it was because in the hope of making a greater profit he refused to take the profit which he might have had at the time when Park offered to relieve him of the stock in accordance with the terms of the guarantee, (page 27.)

As a matter of course, a high functionary who had thus placed himself in a false position with his own Government, and with the people of the country to which he was accredited, must have expected that his action would not long pass without adverse criticism; but General Schenck appears to have thought it very unreasonable, for he says, on page 287:

"It was not long after this that some comment was made in the city upon my being a member of a board of directors of a company which was offering a property on that market. It annoyed me, as you may very well understand, very much, to see that these criticisms were made in the papers. * * * When I saw this comment, I made up my mind at once that perhaps I had committed myself to be drawn into what was a mistake in consenting, under any circumstances, to be one of the managers of the company."

Thereupon he sent the following telegram to the Secretary of State:

FISH, Secretary of State, Washington:

Am surprised and pained by telegrams from United States, published here, regarding my connection with Emma Mine. Have no pecuniary interest except some shares, for which, after investigation fully, I paid dollar for dollar. Having thus decided and raised means to invest, was solicited by respectable Americans to act with gentlemen of known high character as director, to protect their interest and my own in what I believe very valuable property. Perhaps made mistake. Want only honorably and usefully to serve my Government and countrymen, but have not deemed it wrong to try to make something honestly for myself and family. Will withdraw from board, or do whatever you advise. Will not embarrass Administration.

SCHENCK, London.

Received 4.30 p. m., November 27, 1871.

It will be observed that General Schenck here alleges that for the shares which he held he had paid "dollar for dollar;" "that he had raised means to invest;" in other words, that he had made a purchase of stock for cash.

The truth is, as appears by his own testimony, (page 310,) that he had never paid one dollar in money for the stock, but had given his note to Mr. Park for the whole amount in advance of the issue of the prospectus. It is also apparent from his own statement that he had in fact no money which he could invest in the purchase of this stock; that it was in reality a speculation for which he borrowed from the vendor the entire amount of the purchase-money in the expectation of making a profit out of the rise of the stock, but was guaranteed against loss in case it should fall in the open market. In this respect, therefore, the telegram was not an accurate statement of the facts. The statement that he "was solicited by respectable Americans to act with gentlemen of known high character as director" was also incomplete in not stating that these "respectable Americans" were the vendors of the property, who had loaned him the means to invest.

To this telegram General Schenck received the following reply on the next day:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 28, 1871.

SCHENCK, Minister, London:

Although a public officer, you have the full right of every citizen to be a shareholder, and to invest your money in such honest enterprises as you think proper; and neither the Government nor the public have any right to criticise or to censure you for so doing.

The advertisement of the name of a diplomatic representative of the Government as a director of a company seeking to dispose of its shares in the country to which he is accredited is ill-advised and unfortunate, and is calculated to subject him to criticism; but it is assumed that the advertisement of the mining company in the London journals was not your act, but that of the agents of the company without consultation with you.

You are earnestly advised to withdraw your name from the management of the company.

FISH, Secretary.

It is to be observed that the Secretary of State affirms the full right of General Schenck to "invest his money in honest enterprises," but distinctly disapproves the connection "of a diplomatic representative of the Government as a director of a company seeking to dispose of its shares in the country to which he is accredited;" that he characterizes the advertisement of such connection as a director as "ill-advised and unfortunate, and calculated to subject him to criticism;" and that he assumes that the advertisement in the London journals was not the act of General Schenck, but that of the agents of the company, without consultation with him. The testimony of General Schenck shows that this was not the fact, but that the prospectus was issued and advertised with his full knowledge and consent. The disapproval of the Secretary of State was, therefore, by implication full and conclusive. Finally, General Schenck is earnestly advised to withdraw his name from the management of the company. This dispatch of the Secretary of State is, therefore, the official disapproval by the Government of the action of its representative in England in connecting himself as a director of a company seeking to sell its shares in England, and left but one course open to General Schenck, either to resign as minister or to resign as director. The formal resignation of General Schenck as a director was sent in on the 6th of December, 1871, but was not made public nor, so far as the dispatches show, communicated to the Secretary of State until the 12th of January following. This delay in the publication was certainly unfortunate, as it left General Schenck under the imputation of playing into the hands of those who were speculating in the stock and were interested in maintaining its market value. The letter of resignation, as finally sent in, was in the following form:

[The Times, Friday, January 12, 1872.—Extract.]

LONDON, December 6, 1871.

DEAR SIR: I hereby resign my place as a director of the Emma Silver-Mining Company, and request you to communicate this notice of the fact to the board at their next meeting.

In thus withdrawing from the trust reposed in me, I desire to express to my associates in the management of the company my sincere and high appreciation of each and every one of them as gentlemen of distinguished position and character, with whom it has been to me a pleasure to be connected.

My resignation is upon grounds purely personal to myself. In consenting to become a director, I know that I but exercised a private and individual right, in no way incompatible with public or official duty; but I prefer to take away from some who have criticised me even a pretext for their comments or attacks. I beg, therefore, to record my assurance to you and other members of the board that I continue to have the fullest confidence in the value and profitableness of the property they have in charge, in which I still hold all the shares I have been able to take.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBT. C. SCHENCK.

GEORGE ANDERSON, Esq., M. P.,
Chairman, &c.

This letter, written in consequence of the official advice of the Secretary of State, and upon the ground that it was not compatible with the official duties of the American minister to remain as a director, asserts that the resignation is upon grounds purely personal to General Schenck, and that in consenting to become a director he knew that he but exercised a "private and individual right in no way incompatible with public or official duty." This statement appears to your committee to be a flat contradiction of the position asserted in the dispatch of the Secretary of State, that such connection was "ill-advised and unfortunate," and that the advertisement, if made with his knowledge and consent, could not be approved. But the letter of resignation goes still further in violation of the fundamental doctrine as to the duty and conduct of diplomatic representatives, upon which the dispatch of the Secretary of State is based, which evidently is, that it is not becoming in an American minister to take any action to promote or further the sale of shares of a company in the country to which he is accredited. This sound principle is clearly violated when General Schenck took occasion in his letter of resignation to express his "sincere and high appreciation of each and every one of" the directors "as gentlemen of distinguished position and character, with whom it has been to me a pleasure to have been connected," and to state further that "I continue to have the fullest confidence in the value and profitableness of the property they have in charge, in which I still hold all the shares I have been able to take." Here is a distinct indorsement of the character of the American directors, who were the vendors of the property, Messrs. Park, Stewart, and Baxter, and the renewed expression of confidence in the value of the mine. The testimony shows that this form of this letter was the subject of discussion between General Schenck and Mr. Park, and that it was modified in accordance with suggestions made by the latter. (Pages 336, 348, 806, 808, 832.)

The natural and straightforward course was for General Schenck to have informed the board, in such language as he might have chosen to adopt, that he had consulted with his Government as to the propriety of remaining in the board, and had been advised to withdraw, and accordingly tendered his resignation. He did, however, just the opposite; he asserted that his resignation was the result of personal consideration; and in re-indorsing the vendors and the property, he aggravated the offense which had been condemned by the Secretary of State. A copy of this letter of resignation reached the State Department in the month of January, 1872, and, so far as the correspondence submitted to the committee shows, the matter was there dropped.

With regard to the preparation of this letter of resignation, the testimony is somewhat conflicting. Lyon swears, page 58, that Park told him that General Schenck had written two letters of resignation; that Park showed him the first letter and remarked, "I am going to have a better letter than that from the general;" that a few days afterward he showed him a second and modified letter, which was the one finally sent into the board of directors. Schenck in his testimony, page 288, produced the rough draught of his letter of resignation, of which he says, "If you refer to the records of the Emma Mining Company you will find this to be in hæc verba the resignation which was presented and acted upon," and adds, "this resignation was not prepared or written until the 6th."

On page 336 he reiterates "that this is the only letter which I sent to the board;" but on comparison with the actual letter of resignation (page 340) it turned out that General Schenck was mistaken as to the rough draught not having been more extensively modified than appeared upon the face of it; one sentence is almost entirely rewritten, in order to convey the impression that his resignation is not the result of any incompatibility with his public or official duty. So far as Park and Stewart were concerned this was a most material addition to the letter, in its bearing upon the sale of the reserved shares of the company.

On page 347 General Schenck testifies that he did not think Park had made any draught of this letter of resignation.

At a later date the committee received from London the actual letter of resignation sent in by General Schenck in his own handwriting, and a copy thereof in the handwriting of Mr. Park, who had previously testified that to the best of his knowledge and belief he had never made any such copy. General Schenck stated that in this copy there was not a single word in his handwriting, (page 807;) on having his attention called to the interlineations of two words, he inclines to the opinion that they are in his handwriting, and adds, "therefore I must have seen that copy at some time;" and further adds that "he (Park) may have taken a copy at the very time I wrote it;" and finally concludes, "My attention being directed to those words, I am inclined to think that that copy may have been made by Mr. Park and compared by me, and that where he had got it wrong from my original I may have corrected it." Subsequently (page 845) General Schenck says that he cannot admit that one of these words is in his handwriting.

Mr. Park, on the other hand, swears positively that the interlineations are in his handwriting, but that he cannot recollect where, when, or why he made the copy, which previously he testified that he never had any recollection of having made. On the whole, the committee are of opinion that two letters of resignation were prepared, the one a rough draught, written by General Schenck, and the other an amended copy made by him after his conversation with Park, the second having been modified from the first, in accordance with the suggestions of Mr. Park. As this is an important matter, showing the relations of General Schenck to Park at that time, the exact language of Park is herewith inserted, (page 833:)

"General Schenck has shown you a draught which he made and the letter which he afterward made from that draught. I think I saw one of them; perhaps both of them. I think I saw one of them, because General Schenck states that, as to one of them, when I saw the statement that he proposed to retain his shares, I said: 'General, you do not want to commit yourself to that; you may want to sell them. It will be sufficient for you to say which you now hold.' I made that suggestion, and from that fact I may have seen the draught, and it is possible I saw the other; but that I dictated a word of it, except that it should be upon the true ground of the reason for his resignation, so that it should not injure the company or cast suspicion upon it, and making the suggestion that he should not bind himself to hold the stock, has no foundation whatever."

Besides the original allotment of five hundred shares which General Schenck received under his contract with Mr. Park, he became entitled to a further allotment of three hundred shares in the month of April, 1872. These shares were subscribed for, carried, and sold without any intervention whatever on the part of General Schenck beyond signing the application and the usual transfer form in blank, which blank appears to have been filled in with the name of C. M. Fisher, with whom General Schenck is positive, however, he never had any other transactions in relation to the Emma Mine. These shares were sold shortly afterward at a profit of £2,000, which was paid in to General Schenck's credit at Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.'s, but by whom General Schenck is not positive.

In his testimony before the commissioner in London, General Schenck testifies (page 27) that Mr. Park did not find the money for these shares, but that he (General Schenck) carried them and disposed of them "entirely on his own account, and through his own means and arrangement." In his testimony before the committee, (pages 350–352,) in answer to a question whether Mr. Park's money purchased those shares, he testifies: "Yes; Mr. Park, I have since understood, carried these shares and arranged the thing during the three days we held them." Lyon testifies (page 60) that he deposited the money required to procure the allotment of these shares, having procured it on Mr. Park's check, and Mr. Park testifies (page 566) that he gave Lyon the check for this purpose; and again on page 660, that he furnished the money to pay for the stock.

The profit realized from this transaction seems to have been used as the margin with Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. for a speculative purchase of five hundred shares of stock (page 352) to be carried by them for the joint account of General Schenck and General Woodhull, his first secretary of legation.

This venture was still on hand in December, 1872, at the time when it became apparent that dividends would no longer be paid. This fact was communicated to General Schenck in a telegram, bearing Park's signature, (page 697,) and sent from New York to Schenck, reaching him at Paris. This telegram advised General Schenck to sell two thousand shares, (page 743.) Fisher, who was in Paris at that time, obtained this information from General Schenck, and informed his broker in London that General Schenck had directed Colonel Chesebrough, his second secretary of legation, whom he had sent to London to look after this business, to sell two thousand shares short. General Schenck, (page 823,) in answer to a question, whether he did or did not send instructions to Mr. Chesebrough to sell two thousand shares of stock, replied:

"I am very strongly impressed with a belief that I did no such thing. I have no recollection of ever doing anything of the kind. I think he would have tried to do it for me and have done it for me if asked to, but nothing of the sort was done."

On page 842 he says:

"But I am, as I said, perfectly satisfied from my recollection (and the more I think of the matter the more I am satisfied) that I never directed Chesebrough to sell the two thousand shares, and at any rate that no two thousand shares ever were sold for me."

Thereupon the chairman addressed a telegraphic inquiry to Mr. Chesebrough, to which the following reply has been received since the printing of the evidence, and is therefore here inserted in full:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
London, May 8, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your telegram of yesterday, (Sunday)—

"Did General Schenck ever direct you to sell two thousand shares Emma stock? Telegraph briefly, and write fully."

To which I have replied this morning, as follows:

"Have written fully to-day's mail, as requested."

It would be impossible for me "briefly," in a telegram, to answer the inquiry satisfactorily.

The facts in the case are, that on the 14th December, 1872, I was in Paris, when General Schenck arrived there with his three daughters. The evening of the same day he received information that the price of Emma stock had declined rapidly and largely, and he came to me in much anxiety, saying that he would have to go over to London immediately unless I would go for him. I consented to do so. He requested me, on my arrival in London, to see one or two of the directors of the company, to ascertain their views as to the condition of the stock, &c., and then to instruct Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. about selling out some shares they were carrying for him. On the 17th December I received the following telegram from General Schenck:

"Keep my 475 investment; sell at discretion 2,000 Park account, 500 Woodhull."

I did not act upon this telegram further than conveying Schenck's instructions to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. to make sales of the shares in their hands. They sold the five hundred shares held for Woodhull & Schenck, Schenck keeping his original four hundred and seventy-five shares. After General Schenck's return to London I carried instructions from him to McCulloch & Co. to sell two hundred shares.

This comprises all that I have had to do in the buying or selling of Emma stock for General Schenck, and I have had no interest whatever, directly or indirectly, in these transactions, or in any other transactions which may have been made for him.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. H. CHESEBROUGH.

Hon. THOMAS SWANN,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations,
House of Representatives, &c.

A copy of this letter was telegraphed to General Schenck, of which he also received a copy from MR. CHESEBROUGH. To this letter General Schenck has sent the following reply, which it is deemed best to insert in full:

DAYTON, OHIO, May 23, 1876.

SIR: Referring to my telegrams sent last evening, one to you and one to Mr. FAULKNER, I now proceed to send a statement in answer to Colonel Chesebrough's letter, without waiting for reply from either you or MR. FAULKNER. I will endeavor to make this statement full and clear, although it has to be dictated under most unfavorable circumstances to an amanuensis beside the bed to which I am confined.

I would wait to hear from the committee, and in the hope of being well enough to travel to Washington by the end of this week to appear before them in person; but I have this morning learned that it is reported by telegraph that the House of Representatives has ordered your committee to make their report on the investigation of the Emma Mine matter on Thursday.

Fortunately for me, I am enabled now to refer to what has been written by Colonel Chesebrough, having just received a copy of his letter, sent to me at Washington and forwarded from there.

I regret that Colonel Chesebrough could not be present before the committee to testify regularly, and to make a much fuller statement than he has written, and to be subjected, if necessary, to cross-examination. I have heretofore explained to the committee the circumstances of my arrival at Paris, in December, 1872, with my family, from Italy, and of the unexpected and astounding news which met me there from London, in regard to the probable stoppage of dividends on the Emma mining stock and the sudden and disastrous depreciation of its value which was ensuing. I have also referred to the anxiety I had to save myself, if possible, from the great loss that General Woodhull and I were likely to sustain on the five hundred shares we had in his name which were held for us by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. I had no thought even then of parting with the four hundred and seventy-five shares of my original subscription, still believing the property valuable, and that the suspension of dividends would be but temporary. I would not, however, afford the hazard of loss on that five hundred shares which we had purchased on a deposit and credit with the bankers, and had been carrying since the May preceding. The telegram sent by Mr. Gager, in Mr. Park's name, from New York had gone to London, and had been forwarded to me by mail, while in the mean time the unpromising condition of the company appeared to be generally known by all parties interested, who had also been receiving information, and the stock was rapidly falling.

I have explained from the beginning to the committee the character of the telegram I received. It was signed "Park," and gave me information of the apprehended condition of the company's affairs, and suggested, by way of covering my probable loss, a sale of two thousand shares, as I remember, on joint account. From the first I determined that so far as I was concerned I could not take the possible risk of any such sale, however much I desired to save myself from impending loss. I do not consider that it would have been wrong in itself to have thus covered, if I could, the loss I sustained, and I have before this stated to the committee, in reply, I think, to a question put by Mr. BARNUM, that I was inclined to regret I had not done so.

When Colonel Chesebrough, whom I met, as he has stated, at Paris, agreed to go for me at once to London, it was particularly with a view, after consultation with others, to do whatever seemed best to guard the interests of General Woodhull, who was his cousin, and myself. He was fully empowered to act, and was aware of all my views in the matter. During the few days of anxiety which followed, there passed back and forth between him and me a number of notes and telegrams, which I regret have not been preserved, and of which, after an interval of nearly four years and a half, I cannot give any particular account. As I did not sell two thousand shares of the stock, as suggested to me to do, nor any other shares, except those which were held in Woodhull's name for him and myself by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., I have believed, while looking back at the matter, that I did not telegraph to Chesebrough at any time in regard to the two thousand shares, and I have so stated as my distinct impression. The telegram, of which he gives now what purports to be a copy, I do not remember, but I dare say it is correct. It confirms what I have stated in regard to retaining my four hundred and seventy-five original shares as an investment and the sale of the five hundred shares in Woodhull's name. It would seem also that I authorized him to make a sale if, in his discretion, he thought proper, not in any way on my account, but for Park. I had no sham account with Park.

I will now add what has up to this time, since this inquiry has been proceeding, confirmed me in my belief that I had not telegraphed Chesebrough in any form whatever on the subject of the two thousand shares.

When Chesebrough returned from a visit to the United States last winter, he volunteered to tell me of a conversation he had had with somebody connected with the New York Tribune—Whitelaw Reid, I think, he said—in which he was asked if he had received such a telegram from me from Paris, and he informed me that he had replied that he had no recollection of anything of the sort. I said to him that I did not remember having telegraphed to him any such instruction, and he told me that neither did he remember that I had.

Again, when I was about to leave London to present myself before your committee, and was desirious, with a view to refreshing my recollection of matters relating to the Emma Mine, and, for reference to find and collect any papers or memoranda on the subject that might have been preserved, I asked Chesebrough if he had any document or memorandum in his possession. He said, "No, I have not a paper or a scrap on the subject remaining in my hands."

Of course, as his statement is so brief, I cannot tell whether he was mistaken then or whether he has had recourse to the files of the telegraph company, or how it is, that he has been able now to produce or recollect the telegram in question.

Of what is mentioned by Colonel Chesebrough in the last paragraph of his letter, in regard to carrying instruction from me to McCulloch & Co., to sell two hundred shares, I have no remembrance whatever. It was probably in connection with the sale of the five hundred shares which they held.

It is true, as Colonel Chesebrough states, that he never had any interest in any transaction of mine in connection with the Emma Mining Company or its shares; and I believe the committee are in full possession, certainly so far as I can recall the facts, of everything relating thereto with which I have been concerned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

Hon. THOMAS SWANN,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

It will thus be seen that the speculative venture of five hundred shares held for Woodhull and Schenck was closed out, and if two thousand shares of stock were not sold in addition, it was not for lack of orders or of willingness on the part of General Schenck, but because Chesebrough or Jay Cooke, McCullough & Co. would not take the responsibility. It will also be observed that subsequently, after General Schenck's return to London, he gave instructions to sell two hundred shares, but whether this was a short sale or not does not appear. The conclusion, then, of the whole matter is that General Schenck, besides having been a director of the Emma Mining Company, was engaged in speculative operations in the stock with Trenor W. Park, the vendor of the mine, (page 660,) with General Woodhull, his secretary of legation, and upon his own account to the extent hereinbefore stated, in such manner as to subject the name and station of the minister of the United States to criticism.

The committee therefore find as to the inquiries announced at the beginning of the report:

First. Upon the authority of the dispatch of the Secretary of State, that it was not proper for the American minister at the court of St. James to connect himself as a director with the Emma Mining Company of London. This position is confirmed by the authority of Phillimore, (volume 2, page 194,) who says:

"In truth, every state ought, by expressly forbidding their embassadors to combine engagements in private trade or commerce with the sacred duty of representation, to prevent any question of the kind ever arising. The Roman law on this point deserves to be imitated: 'Enim qui legatione fungitur, neque alienis neque propriis negotiis se interponere debet.'"

Second. That the relations of General Schenck to the vendors of the Emma Mine were of such a character as to cast suspicion upon his motives and subject his action to unfavorable criticism. But the committee believe that he was not guilty of a fraud or of any fraudulent intention in his connection with the company or the vendors of the mine.

Third. That his subsequent speculative dealings in the shares of the company were not compatible with his diplomatic station and the maintenance of a position of honor and usefulness at the court near which he was accredited.

The committee therefore submit the following resolution, and unanimously recommend its passage by the House:

Resolved, That this House condemns the action of General Robert C. Schenck, United States minister at the court of St. James, in becoming a director of the Emma Silver Mining Company of London, and his operations in connection with the shares of the said company and the venders thereof, as ill-advised, unfortunate, and incompatible with the duties of his official position.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the unanimous verdict of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in reference to the connection of General Schenck, late the American minister at the court of St. James, with the Emma Mine, and such doubtless will be the verdict of this House and the general judgment of the country. This verdict has been reached only after weeks of patient investigation, in which General Schenck has had every possible opportunity for his defense and for his vindication. The committee have performed their duty with a profound sense of the consequences to General Schenck, after a career of over forty years in the public service, and with a sincere desire, if possible, to shield him at the close of that career from the censure which they are now reluctantly constrained to inflict.

If his reputation had been alone concerned, the mantle of charity and silence might have been drawn over the facts of this unfortunate affair; but unhappily the honor and dignity of the people of the United States became necessarily involved in the affair, when, upon the receipt of a copy of General Schenck's letter of resignation, the Administration failed to recall him at once from his mission for having deliberately violated, in this letter, after explicit notice from the Secretary of State, the well-settled principles which should govern the conduct of our representatives in foreign countries.

The committee would have failed in their duty if they had admitted by their silence the doctrine that an American minister may use his official station for the purpose of promoting private gain and be allowed to retain his high office. Of all the positions in public life the embassador occupies the most delicate, the most responsible, the most honorable. He represents abroad the majesty of the people; he carries with him into foreign lands an absolute immunity from arrest. The flag of his country makes his domicile sacred from intrusion. No matter what crimes he may commit, he is amenable only to the laws of his own country, upon the soil of which he is supposed to stand wherever his foot may rest.

But while no harm can come to him personally by any act of his, he can commit no act, whether noble or infamous, which does not directly affect the honor of the nation which he represents. Hence his guiding rule of action must necessarily be to subordinate all personal and private interests to the national honor; and his immunity from prosecution is the very reason why he should refrain from engaging in any operations by which others may sustain loss while he is protected from personal responsibility. Of all places in the public service, it is the one in which self-denial is the most necessary, the most conspicuous, and the most honorable. On the other hand, so delicate is his position that the slightest intimation from the power to which he is accredited that his presence is unacceptable is held to be the warrant for his recall without demurrer and without explanation.

It is true that foreign nations exercise a wise discretion on subjects of so much delicacy, and generally forbear to intimate dissatisfaction, even when there is good ground for it; but this is all the stronger reason why a proud and sensitive people should not be humiliated before the civilized world by the continuance in office of a representative who has fallen below that high standard of honor which we desire to maintain among the nations. "Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion." The honor of the embassadors of the United States should not from their own acts become the subject of criticism in the newspapers, the clubs, and the social circles of the countries to which they are accredited; and above all, when admonished of a fault which would be venial if promptly and publicly confessed, they should not aggravate the offense by repeating it, as General Schenck did in his letter of resignation, suffered to go upon the records of the State Department without prompt and just rebuke from the Government, which could only thus relieve itself from the responsibility of this flagrant violation of the well-settled usages of diplomatic intercourse and conduct, whereby he proved himself unequal to the trust reposed in him by his own Government and abused the confidence of that government to which he was accredited.

If this view of the subject be correct—and there would seem to be no possible escape from it—the responsibility for every hour of the disgrace which for more than four years has, out of this transaction, rested upon the American name, and caused every right-minded lover of his country to blush for shame, is brought home to the Administration, and there would be no occasion to make further comment on this unhappy business except for the purpose of showing the deplorable consequences which are sure to result from failure on the part of the Government to deal promptly and sternly with it servants for any serious violation of its own regulations, its instructions, or of the well-settled principles and long-established usages of diplomatic intercourse, to the end that the repetition of such offenses may hereafter become impossible and the fair fame of the American people never again be tarnished by such disgraceful transactions. I do not forget the wise and witty French proverb, "Larons notre linge sale en famille;" but this linen was soiled abroad, and has so long been worn in the face of the whole world that we have no choice but to make its purification as conspicuous and as public as was the transaction by which it was polluted.

For this dreary and unpalatable task, necessary and profitable, however, "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness," the materials furnished by the evidence submitted with the report are ample.

They serve to show how the embassador of the United States so far forgot his high station that he not only consented to become a director in a company proposing to sell its shares in the country to which he was accredited, but allowed his name and the official title of "American minister" to go forth in the prospectus as the voucher of its "exceptional character;" how, by subscribing publicly, according to his own statement, for £10,000 of the stock, apparently upon the same terms as the other subscribers, but in reality upon a private arrangement previously made with the vendors, in which he put no money at risk and was absolutely guaranteed against loss, the envoy of the great Republic placed himself in the attitude of a "puffer" at an auction-sale; how he speculated in the stock of a corporation which he had thus helped to create and direct; how he seemed to be incapable of drawing the distinction between investment and speculation; how he associated one of his secretaries of legation in these speculative operations, and availed of the services of the other to watch the fluctuations of the stock-market and practically act as his broker for the sale of shares; how he records his opinion that it is a proper thing, not merely for an ordinary man, but for an American minister "to sell stock short"—that is, to sell what he does not own—and expresses his regret that he did not do so, and indemnify himself against loss by transferring it to some one else not in possession of the information which he had received through private sources; how he so confuses his accounts of profit and loss that he cannot separate the profits which he actually did or might have realized out of his original transaction with Mr. Park with the losses which he made in speculations in the stock having no relation to this transaction with Park; how he accepts credits upon the note which he had given to Park, the nature and origin of which he had no knowledge whatever except that they arose out of transactions wherein he was at no risk; how he declines further credits of the same character because he thinks that the limit of favors has been reached; how he arrived at this conclusion only after the public press had been filled with hostile criticism; how his memory as to the mode of payment for the second allotment of shares leads him in London to swear that Park did not provide the means for the payment thereof, and how before the committee, when it had been clearly shown that Park did provide these means, he retracts the statement he made in London; how, in the final settlement with Park, he transfers to him in payment of his indebtedness stocks upon which he continues to draw the dividends; how, on leaving London, he is forced to plead his diplomatic privilege as his defense against the service of a writ in a civil action growing out of his unfortunate connection with this disastrous undertaking; and how, finally, he reiterates his inability to comprehend the false and unfortunate position in which he is placed before the public by a series of ill-advised transactions in which it is charitable to regard his memory as at fault, and to look upon him as the victim of designing and unscrupulous men, leading and persuading him to an equal ruin of reputation and purse.

These materials serve to show how William M. Stewart, a Senator of the United States, while acting as counsel for a client who had placed his interests unreservedly in his hands, with whom he had arranged for a contingent fee, which should have bound him all the more jealously to guard the interest of his client, became the purchaser of that interest at a time and under circumstances when he could have computed its value with almost mathematical certainty at a price which gave to the client $150,000, which was practically the contingent fee, and gave to the counsel the larger sum, $275,000, which should have gone to the client; how this magnificent sum, which was paid by Park to Stewart, not in pursuance of any express written agreement, such as usually regulates large money transactions even among the best of friends, but in accordance with an unwritten understanding apparently based upon a sentiment of honor which has been formulated into the English language; how the legal redress wisely secured by the law to the client under such circumstances was cut off by a further payment at a later date, which Stewart stigmatizes as black-mail, and a release secured, which, as a summary of the whole transaction, as a legal curiosity, and a model form for lawyers who desire to secure protection from their clients, it is well to preserve:

> Know all men by these presents that I, James Elias Lyon, of Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, in consideration of the sum of $50,000 to me in hand paid by William M. Stewart, of the State of Nevada, now of Washington, in the District of Columbia, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do hereby fully and forever release and discharge the said Stewart from all and every demand, claim, or right of action of every description that I have or may claim to have against him, whether legal or equitable, and especially from any and all claims, demands, or causes of action of every description growing out of his relation as attorney or counsel or agent for me in the litigation concerning the Emma Mine, so called, and the various proceedings, negotiations, contracts, and conveyances concerning or connected with said Emma Mine, and the property thereto belonging, and the conduct, management, and disposition thereof by him, the said Stewart, in every and all respects and particulars.

How thus was secured immunity from the claims of his client, but not from the impartial judgment of the legal profession and of the world.

These materials serve to show finally how Trenor W. Park, "a member of the American bar, the president of the national bank at North Bennington, Vermont," and well known to the American public for his connection with the Mariposa Company, whose disastrous failure some years ago will not soon be forgotten by those who suffered; the great author of all this mischief, with a skill which has never been surpassed, going to London an entire stranger, but having carefully prepared the way by large shipments of ore and glowing accounts of the production of the mine, within one short month secured the services of Albert Grant, the greatest manipulator of speculative shares of modern times, agreeing to pay therefor a rate of compensation which may be small for him, but which in this country of primitive notions would be deemed decidedly magnificent; how he provided in the contract for sustaining the market pending the allotment, by purchases of the shares at fictitious premiums, so as to gather in the money of bona fide investors, a process said to be usual in England, but which here would be regarded as little short of robbery; how widows and clergymen and half-pay officers, and others living upon annuities, were thus induced to invest their scanty capital in the hope of securing permanent dividends at a high rate out of an enterprise said to be "exceptional" by the American minister, (let us be thankful that such exceptional cases are rare;) how he ingratiated himself into the confidence of the American representative at the court of Saint James so that within two short weeks he felt an irresistible desire to shower benefits upon him, and to relieve him from the embarrassments arising from large expenditures out of a narrow official income; how he inspired the minister with that charming confidence which accepts favors without suspicion that they are to be requited; how he issues a prospectus containing statements calculated to persuade the most wary, but which turn out to be in mournful contrast with the actual issue of the enterprise; how, when he was about to lose, by the resignation of the American minister, the main-stay upon which he relied for the sale of the remaining half of the shares of the company which had been tied up for a time, he procures a letter, which was declared to be in effect better than to have the minister remain as a director, wherein his own character is re-indorsed and the great value of the property re-affirmed; how everybody who could assist or injure the successful perpetration of the sale was conciliated by "pulls," as the Senator from Nevada sarcastically describes them, upon the funds collected from a confiding public, so that "by a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," about a million of dollars was expended in preliminary expenses, of which the great American banking-house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. got a "pull" of $125,000; how, when doubts had begun to arise as to the continued productiveness of the property before the reserve shares had been sold, he procured the services of the vice-chairman of the company, Brydges-Williams, esq., M. P., to make a personal examination of the mine by the payment of £5,000, and a call for or right to take two thousand shares of stock at a price at which the call could only be profitable to the examiner as the result of a favorable report; how the favorable report was made, and the reserved shares were sold at a premium of £3 per share; how, when the public supposed these were still tied up for months to come, they were all sold within two weeks of the receipt by telegraph of the report; how even the astute and accomplished Albert Grant was induced, by a process which no man can find out, to abate his claims for one-half the profits, and accept £1 per share in lieu thereof; how he was induced to give up his just claim for £2,000 commission on the stock which had been allotted to General Schenck, and how the same was credited on Schenck's note to Park, falling like manna from heaven; how Park bought and sold the shares through dark and devious courses, coming out at the end with a profit even on these transactions; how, when the shares were selling at over £20 apiece in London, he bought out his partners in New York at less than half that price; how at the shareholders' meetings in London, which he attended, everything was made lovely for everybody, so that no one appears to have any legal ground against him for indemnity, although dividends ceased after thirteen months, and the shares are now selling at twenty-five shillings apiece; how the whole business is now involved in litigation on both sides of the Atlantic, so that Park declined, for fear of the consequences, to put his accounts upon the record, or to testify as to the amount of profit which he realized from the sale of the shares; how libel suits are pending against newspapers who have ventured to express unfavorable opinions in regard to an operation which has caused a greater scandal in the business and diplomatic world than any transaction of modern times, to the specter of which the author of its being, Trenor W. Park, triumphantly exclaims:

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

All this and much more of the same unsavory sort can be learned from a perusal of the evidence herewith submitted; but these are matters which only concern the American people, because they serve to show the injurious consequences to the fair fame of the United States arising out of the failure of the Government to deal promptly and firmly with its minister when, by his becoming a director and by his letter of resignation, he made the grave and irreparable mistake of indorsing and re-indorsing the enterprise and the men who have caused this great disaster and this greater reproach.

What the Government failed to do the American people demand of their representatives, the stern condemnation of this departure from the traditions of the fathers and the accepted usages of diplomatic life, especially because, to its credit be it said, it is the first symptom in the foreign department of the Government of that general demoralization which seems to have crept into every other branch of the public service.

The Republic can now only be saved by the exercise of stern, relentless, uncompromising virtue, refusing to surrender any question of principle, and swiftly and surely destroying in their very birth the germs of corruption which if allowed to live will surely sap the foundations of free government, our great inheritance, and the chief hope of our posterity.

The people are therefore in no temper to allow sympathy with any man, however eminent his services and long his tenure of public office, and however much he may be entitled, by reason of his advanced years or his impaired fortune, to the tender consideration of this House, to interfere with the vindication of the name, honor, and majesty of the American people from the criticism of the civilized world arising out of the errors of judgment of its public servants or of the Administration. The time has come when the public sentiment demands more than economy, more than honesty; it demands purity and self-denial from its officials. The old generation of public men is passing away with the first century of the Republic. Few men are left alive who can date back to the time when this Government was founded by the virtue and the sacrifice of the patriots who achieved our independence; but the sentiment of honor and the spirit of self-denial which led them to stake "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" for the establishment of a government in which principle and purity should be the conditions of its existence still survive, and it is a mistake to suppose that because they have grown rich and powerful the people of this country have become enervated, shameless, or corrupt.

The spirit abroad is the spirit of reformation. The people are determined to bring back that better era of the Republic in which, when men consecrated themselves to the public service, they utterly abnegated all selfish purposes; when public officers rejected gifts as dishonoring alike to the giver and the taker; when Presidents and great officers of state as a rule retired to honorable poverty; when Franklin with his modest income and his uncourtly costume, even though he had a thrifty mind, rejecting all thought of gain while employed in the public service, was held in more honor than the proudest embassador of the proudest empire; when John Quincy Adams sold his bank-shares before he would take his seat in Congress, lest his vote might be called in question; when members of Congress knew not the mysteries of Credit Mobilier; when members of the Cabinet were selected because they were statesmen, "honest, capable, faithful," and not because of their skill in managing party politics; when to be summoned into the public service was a priceless honor and not an opportunity for private gain; when a civil-service system practically existed in the Government, because it had not yet been formulated into the perfunctionary platforms of party; when a change of administration did not inaugurate a disgraceful scramble for place, and the fatal doctrine "to the victors belong the spoils" had not yet been invented; when the idea of a trust was the subordination of the trustee and all his personal interests to the rightful claims of those for whom he acted; when lawyers were not accustomed to speculate upon the rights of their clients; when vendors were not suffered to profit by false representations; when the honor and fame of the nation were dearer and greater than the reputation or the fortune of any citizen; when degenerate men who were willing to barter away the national honor in foreign lands in exchange for private gains, however great, would have been gibbeted for the general execration.

It is for this reason that the present investigation is of the gravest importance, and it indicates a more healthy state of public opinion, and it should be a matter of general congratulation that the committee have been able by the exercise of mutual forbearance and patience to come to a unanimous conclusion. No public money has been misappropriated; but the national honor, which is above all money, has been tarnished, thoughtlessly if you will, but if so, by the mistake and unconscious ignorance of a great public officer, who has not yet, after the lapse of four years, been properly rebuked by his own Government.

There are positions and circumstances in which ignorance is as mischievous as crime; and I feel constrained and grieved to say that the connection of the American minister at the court of Saint James with the Emma Mine belongs to that category. We may pity, we may sympathize, but we must condemn, in order that the condemnation which belongs to him and the Administration should no longer rest upon the consciences and the name of the American people, and that it shall forever be impossible for this humiliating offense to be repeated by an embassador of the United States or fail to be punished by his Government.

Much of what I have said, Mr. Speaker, might with more force, and, it seems to me, with equal propriety, have been included in the report. But the majority of the committee have deemed it better to yield somewhat of their convictions, and make the report, as nearly as may be, a colorless statement of the facts developed by the testimony, in order to secure what they regard as of inestimable value to the rising generation of the country, the example of a unanimous report, made without regard to party affiliations and prejudices, upon a subject which concerns the reputation and dignity of the nation before the civilized world. Any other report would be open to the criticism that it was dictated by partisan feeling, and the condemnation of conduct which has brought disgrace upon the nation, and might otherwise come to be regarded as a precedent, would necessarily lose much of its value to the country, the honor and welfare of which should be regarded by every well-wisher of his race as infinitely beyond and above all party considerations. Parties are but temporary, and will surely perish with the changing conditions of the times; but the nation will as surely survive forever, if we can preserve the spirit of virtue and patriotism by which it was created, and which should make us all willing to sacrifice party and prejudice upon the common altar of the country, and join in the universal centennial prayer, "God save the Republic."

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. Speaker, I will not review any of the facts of this case. You have just heard the report read, and I leave the facts as there stated to have their proper impression on your minds. It is a pleasing circumstance to me that not a bill or report or resolution has so far come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs during the present session of Congress which has not been unanimously concurred in by that committee. Such is the case with the resolution now submitted for the adoption of this body. We have concurred in acquitting the late American minister of any knowledge of the fraud which inspired the Emma mine speculation, and which so adroitly and successfully imposed it upon the British public; yet at the same time we condemn General Schenck for permitting himself to be made an instrument by designing men to mature and give character to a private business transaction which has brought reproach upon American credit in all the bourses and exchanges of Europe. While, therefore, we acquit him of all such knowledge of the real character of that transaction and of the motives of its promoters as would in a court of justice make him a party to the conspiracy, yet we are equally decided in our conviction that the active aid and support which, as the accredited representative of this nation, he gave to that unfortunate and disreputable speculation was an official impropriety of the gravest character, which ought to receive the condemnation of this House.

If General Schenck had made himself familiar with the doctrines of public law, he would have seen that there has not been a public jurist since the days of Grotius who, if he touched upon this particular branch of the subject at all, has not expressed his decided condemnation of the practice of embassadors and ministers becoming engaged in the pursuits of trade or commerce, or in private enterprises of any kind, in the country to which they have been accredited. All pursuits and occupations of that character are utterly incompatible with the duties, position, and dignity of the representative of a sovereign power. Such employments must not only withdraw his time and attention from the peculiar and responsible duties which devolve upon him, but they impair his social and public standing, and often lead to humiliating exhibitions in the courts of such foreign country. The inviolability attached to a public minister is among the cardinal principles of public law. To surround him with that perfect independence and dignity which should belong to the representative of a sovereign power, his person, his house, his office, his family and servants, his personal property, are all withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the country in which he resides, and are placed under the protection of international law. Nothing can more signally illustrate the general sentiment of the enlightened world in discountenancing practices of this kind in diplomatic agents than the doctrine recognized in the courts of this country and England, and in every other court of justice in Europe, that if a minister departs from the proper sphere of his duties, and engages in the pursuits of trade and commerce of any kind, he forfeits, as to all property so invested and acquired the privileges of his diplomatic character, and such property becomes the subject of seizure by legal process like that of any other subject of the realm. This connection with private transactions drags him down from his high position as the privileged representative of a sovereign power, and brings him to a level, so far at least as that property is concerned—of an ordinary litigant in the country to which he has been thus accredited.

It is to avoid this unseemly descent from his high privileges as a minister accorded to him by international law, and to guard against the disgraceful spectacle of seeing a nation's representative struggling in the courts of a foreign country against grasping and enraged creditors, that the doctrine has been so impressively announced that no minister can, without a gross violation of the proprieties of his position, become engaged in the pursuits of trade or commerce in the country to which he has been sent as minister.

If this be true as to the ordinary pursuits of trade and commerce, which are not objectionable in themselves, how much more aggravated is the impropriety when a minister assumes to patronize an essentially hazardous enterprise, originating in his own country and transferred for the purposes of speculation to the country to which he is accredited; when he becomes a joint associate and partner in that enterprise; when he becomes one of its recognized and public managers; when he unites in a prospectus embracing some very doubtful facts, inviting the people of that friendly nation to invest their money in that speculation; when he gives the full weight of his official character and position to the success of the scheme, and who, when he finds that he and others have been deceived by the promoters of this speculation, seeks to retrieve his losses by the hazards of the stock board. Now, sir, General Schenck might not be personally liable to have his body taken before the British courts while he was minister in London, yet no one can question that all the shares of stock that he acquired in that company (if after the 1st of January, 1873, they were worth the pursuit) might have been taken under proper process of the courts, and the humiliating spectacle exhibited of an American minister engaged in legal controversy in the courts of the country to which he had been accredited.

I doubt if a case has occurred within the present century where any person holding the rank of a European minister plenipotentiary has connected himself publicly with any private enterprise in the country of his mission, unless it be the case of the Duke of Saldanha, the Portuguese minister at the British court. This has been the only case which General Schenck has been able to cite in justification or extenuation of his conduct, and it was that precedent which, as he says, led him into the grave error which is the subject of our examination. But even that case, if it were a precedent worthy of notice, differs in many essential particulars from the Emma Mine enterprise. The concession to construct the Lisbon Steam Tramway Company was an exclusive concession made by the Portuguese government to the Duke of Saldanha himself, its minister; he was made in his own country the president of that company; and the sole purpose of his prospectus was to solicit capital to construct an enterprise of great utility and of no hazard in his own country. But this solitary departure from diplomatic usage cannot excuse the extreme impropriety of such acts and should not for a moment have been relied upon by General Schenck as a precedent to guide him in the course which he adopted in the Emma Mine enterprise.

I believe that no case has ever before occurred in the history of the United States where one of our diplomatic agents has been charged with an impropriety similar to that now ascribed to the late minister at London. This may well account for the fact that neither Congress by its legislation nor the State Department by its "personal instructions to the diplomatic agents in foreign countries" has ever deemed it necessary to guard against such an evil by positive instructions for its prohibition.

All are familar with the wide distinction recognized by international law between diplomatic agents and consuls. Consuls are not public ministers. They are commercial agents. They do not represent their country. They are not entitled to the peculiar immunities of embassadors. No state is bound to permit the residence of foreign consuls. In civil and criminal cases they are subject to the local law in the same manner with other foreign residents owing a temporary allegiance to the state. For many years it was allowable for consuls, and it was their ordinary practice, to engage in mercantile, financial, and commercial pursuits. But experience has developed the evils which have resulted from this practice even in the case of consuls, and thirty years ago Congress passed a law prohibiting every consul-general, consul, or commercial agent acting under the authority of the United States to be interested in or transact any business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as a clerk or agent for any such person, within the limits of his consulate or commercial agency, directly or indirectly, either in his own name or in the name or through the agency of any other person; and he shall, in his official bond, stipulate as a condition thereof that he will not violate this prohibition.

Now I am well aware that there are some considerations which, in view of the nature of their functions, would make these provisions of law more appropriate to consuls than to ministers, yet the spirit of the law is here developed, and in fact only restricts consuls from pursuits, which the just construction of international law discountenances in ministers and embassadors.

Mr. Speaker, it is with no pleasure that I shall cast a vote of condemnation against that distinguished individual. He has filled many important and prominent positions in this Republic. He is a man of many kind, noble, and generous traits of character. I am even prepared to admit that "he has done the state some service." Yet it matters not who may be sufferer, we must enforce purity, propriety, and official dignity in our representatives abroad, and if a case is brought to our notice where the proprieties of official position have been violated, whether willfully or from want of due enlightenment, we should rebuke the act that it may serve as a warning and admonition to those who may succeed them in the future.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. HENDEE. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman from Vermont has some matter that he thinks it important to bring before the House at this moment, I will yield to him.

PREMATURE PUBLICATION OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. I designed to have presented this matter to the House at the earliest opportunity on yesterday, but as I was occupying the chair when the motion to adjourn was made I was prevented from so doing. I desire to offer a preamble and resolution, but before they are read I will state that I offer them at the request of the Committee for the District of Columbia and also at the request of certain employés of the House who have charge of the committee-room, and upon whom reflections have been cast, and from a sense of duty on my own part as a member of this House.

The Committee for the District of Columbia have been engaged for the last four months continuously in an investigation of District affairs. The testimony which that committee had been taking was closed a few days since, and the chairman, Judge BUCKNER, on Saturday last, I think, presented to the committee his personal views in writing as to what he considered the committee should report in the premises. As there had been no discussion or consideration of the question by the committee, it was requested and agreed that his views, which were in the form of a report, should not in any way be made public or come to the public notice; that as they reflected upon the official conduct of six or seven prominent gentlemen who were holding public positions in this city, and inasmuch as it was not yet a report of the committee, it should be kept secret; but that for the benefit of the committee a limited number of copies should be printed at the Government Printing Office. The employés of the committee-room were informed of the action of the committee in this regard, and the officers of the Government Printing Office were also notified. A few copies were printed and brought in a very carefully sealed packet to the room of the committee and placed in the hands of the clerk.

This was on Monday morning last. On Tuesday morning a full abstract of the views of Judge BUCKNER appeared in the New York Tribune, and on the afternoon of the same day the Evening Star, of this city, contained a complete verbatim copy of his views as submitted by him as the report of the committee. It is apparent that the views of Mr. BUCKNER, or a copy of them, must have been taken from the committee-room or from the Government Printing Office in some clandestine and improper manner or that the employés of the House, or of the committee-room, or of the Printing Office have been guilty of some fault, neglect, or questionable act.

Now, inasmuch as that document has been printed as the report of the committee and has gone to the country through the press as the report of the committee, I wish to say in justice to the parties whose official conduct is criticised in it, and in this most public manner, and in the plainest language which I can use, that no report of that committee in the matter referred to has ever been agreed upon; that there never has been more than one hour's discussion upon the subject in any way, and that not even the first item of a report has yet up to this time been agreed upon by the committee. For the purpose of investigating and ascertaining how that document or a copy of it was obtained or taken out of the committee-room, or out of the Government Printing Office, or put into the hands of the newspaper men, I offer the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk. I believe, sir, the secrets and papers of the committee-rooms should be kept as sacred and secure as the secrets and papers of this House, and that summary and effective measures should be taken to this end; and to prevent as far as we may the recurrence of such an event as I have thus briefly brought to the attention of the House, I trust there will be no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Committee for the District of Columbia has for the past four months been investigating the affairs of said District under authority of this House; and whereas the said investigation has had reference mainly to the official conduct of the commissioners and the board of audit created under the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874; and whereas said committee did, on or about the 7th day of this month, finish and close its investigation so far as the taking of testimony was concerned, and on the 20th of the present month Mr. BUCKNER, chairman of said committee, presented in the form of a report to the committee his views in writing as to the result of said investigation, when, without discussion, it was agreed by said committee that the question as to the report which the said committee ought to make in the premises should be postponed, and that a limited number of copies of the views of Mr. BUCKNER, the chairman of said committee, should be printed at the Government Printing Office for the use of the members of the committee; and it was also directed that the said views of Mr. BUCKNER should not be made public, and the employés of this House having charge of the committee-room of said committee and the clerk of the same were notified of this determination of the committee to keep the matter from the public until the committee had taken action on the subject, and of this the officers of the Government Printing Office had full notice also; and whereas said copies were printed and brought to the room of the committee and delivered to the clerk of said committee on Monday morning, the 22d instant, and were by him distributed to the members of the committee, except a few copies which were put under lock and key in the committee-room; and whereas the New York Tribune of Tuesday morning last contained a full abstract of the said views of Mr. BUCKNER, and the Evening Star, printed in this city, of the same date, contained a complete and full copy of said document as the report of said committee; and further, said committee had not even discussed or attempted to agree upon any report until yesterday (Wednesday) morning, and has not yet by majority or otherwise agreed upon a report in the matter referred to; and whereas it is alleged that a copy of the said views of Mr. BUCKNER was obtained from said committee-room by improper means and through the fault, neglect, or improper act of some of the officers or employés of this House or of the Government Printing Office or of said committee: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be, and the same is, directed to inquire into the matter, and, if possible, learn the manner in which, and the time when, the copy of said paper was obtained for publication, and by whom and from whom it was obtained; and for this purpose said committee is empowered to send for persons and papers, and to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HENDEE. I move the previous question on the passage of that resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE EMMA MINE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report upon the Emma Mine.

[Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move that the report of the committee be printed and recommitted, with leave to report at any time.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EDWARD O'M. CONDON.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 104) for the relief of Edward O'M. Condon were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILLS.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, in order that bills from the Senate may be referred.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of Hans C. Peterson was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

RANK OF PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

The bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CONTRACT WITH A. E. REYNOLDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. COX] laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the commanding officer at Fort Reno, Indian Territory, relative to a contract for wood and hay with A. E. Reynolds; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

LIGHT-SHIP OFF TRINITY SHOALS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Light-House Board in relation to an appropriation for the establishment of a light-ship off Trinity Shoals, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

OSAGE FUNDS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, together with the joint resolution authorizing investment of funds belonging to the Osage tribe of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. WIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish this House with a copy of the report of Hon. Isaac N. Morris as one of the Government commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to examine into the condition of the Union Pacific Railroad between Omaha and the summit of the Rocky Mountains in the year 1869.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. HYMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3571) for the relief of Cherokee Indians who have removed themselves to the nation, west; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HARRIET W. WILKINSON.

Mr. HOPKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3572) granting a pension to Harriet W. Wilkinson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROFESSOR HAYDEN'S REPORT.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 4,500 copies of Professor Hayden's Ninth Annual Report of the United States geological and geographical survey of the Territories for 1875, 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the use of the geological survey.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to have a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the Indian appropriation bill printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., May 24, 1876.

SIR: I received late yesterday afternoon your favor of the 22d instant, inclosing copy of the Indian appropriation bill as it came from the Appropriation Committee.

In compliance with your request to be advised whether that bill in its present shape is satisfactory to this Office, I beg respectfully to state that should the bill pass without amendment in some vital points it seems to me the service would be crippled, if not entirely disorganized. You will understand me as confining myself in that statement strictly to the amounts to be appropriated by the bill, and not to the sweeping and radical change in the method of conducting Indian affairs which the committee propose. Many of the reductions made by the committee the Office is not disposed to contest, and my comments will be confined entirely to those points which seem to me vital. In the time allowed for the preparation of this letter I can only make very cursory reference to these points, having no opportunity to enter at length into the reasons which govern the Office.

Upon page 92 of the Book of Estimates will be found an estimate of $20,000 for buildings at agencies and repairs, which has been entirely stricken out by the committee. The small sum heretofore allowed for this purpose has been entirely insufficient to keep the agency buildings in proper order, and many of them now need extensive repairs. It will not be practicable to abandon most of them even should the proviso in the last section of the bill requiring the issue of subsistence so far as practicable from Army posts become a law.

The $1,000 should be given for vaccination of Indians. This was estimated for and has been stricken out.

I cannot too strongly urge the appropriation of $50,000 for contingencies, which was estimated for and which has also been stricken out. The need of a fund to meet emergencies in a service like this cannot be overestimated, nor will that need be in any degree lessened by the proposed transfer. To-day two mills on Indian reservations are standing idle because the dams have been washed away by high floods, and the Office has no fund upon which to draw for the necessary $1,500 to repair the damages. If the Indian service was like the military service, where the persons to be provided for can be relied upon to obey orders and where their wants and numbers can be accurately determined in advance, or if the money appropriated was to be used in the construction of fortifications or buildings where work could be suspended without absolute danger to neighboring defenseless citizens, and without a well-nigh total loss of any advance already gained, the need of such a contingent fund as this asked for might be in some respects diminished. But with a restless, uncertain horde of Indians to be advanced as far as possible, and in any event to be kept quiet, and in view of the unforeseen and unavoidable causes of outlay which are frequently brought to the attention of the Office, I cannot well conceive how the service can be smoothly or even successfully administered if this estimate is wholly refused.

On page 13 of the bill the committee recommend certain appropriations for the Crows, but no provision is made for the payment provided for by their treaty of 1868 of $10 for each Indian roaming and $20 for each Indian engaged in agriculture. The Office estimates this amount at $30,000. The number of these Indians is three thousand, and the omission to provide this sum is in violation of treaty stipulations.

The provision for the mixed Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters has been reduced by the committee from $20,000 to $15,000. Under an unratified treaty with them the Government engaged to expend $12,000 annually for provisions and goods, $2,500 for education, and to support a farmer, physician, engineer, blacksmith, carpenter, and interpreter. To provide these employés and to transport the goods and provisions $500 is utterly inadequate. It is proper to add that the Indians are unable to comprehend the authority and force of the legislation by which the ratification of treaties thus solemnly made with them has been refused. They acknowledge themselves bound by the stipulations and consider the Government of the United States equally bound. The practical effect of the disregard of these treaties would be nothing less disastrous than that of a treaty duly ratified.

The committee have reduced the estimate for the Sioux from $1,400,000 to $1,000,000. The appropriation last year was $1,100,000, and that was supplemented by a deficiency appropriation of $150,000. The number of these Indians, determined at every agency by actual count, is 43,484. The cost of the full ration heretofore issued to them is fifteen and one-half cents. To support them during the year would require nearly two and one-half millions. The cost of the ration adopted by the present agent at Red Cloud under the stress of short supplies was about eleven cents. To support these Indians on the short ration will cost about $1,750,000. It is charged by various parties (though the names and standing of those making the statements I have been unable to learn) that the number of the Sioux has been greatly exaggerated. I find no proof of this, and a recent examination at the Red Cloud agency and Spotted Tail agency shows a substantial agreement with previous statements. I do not believe that, if the numbers have been exaggerated, (which I am very strongly disposed to doubt,) the exaggeration has proceeded to the extent assumed by the committee. If the full estimate of the Office is given, the amount allowed per capita for the support of these Indians during the year is less than $33, or say sixty cents a week. The appropriation recommended by the committee reduces this amount to $23 per year, being about forty-five cents per week. I do not believe it possible to keep the Sioux quiet on any such sum, excited as they already are by the impudent and forcible usurpation of the Black Hills by miners and by the military operations against the "hostiles."

It should be recollected further that if General Crook succeeds in subduing the hostiles and bringing them into the agencies an addition of three or four thousand will be made to the feeding-list, and the inadequacy of the appropriation allowed by the committee will be increased in a corresponding ratio. I would also note that the treaty of 1868 with the Sioux provides that $10 shall be allowed to each Indian roaming and $20 to each Indian engaged in agriculture. Heretofore these Indians have received on this account an appropriation of $200,000, it being estimated that there are 20,000 Indians roaming. The actual number greatly exceeds this estimate, but in view of the large expenditures required for subsisting the Indians it has not been deemed advisable to insist too strongly upon the fulfillment of the treaty stipulations in this particular. In my judgment, however, the amount should not be reduced below $200,000.

Equally dangerous, in my opinion, is the reduction proposed by the committee in the appropriation for the Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico. The appropriation last year was $450,000, and a threatened outbreak at one of the agencies in New Mexico was averted only by a deficiency appropriation of $25,000, while another deficiency appropriation of $50,000 was made for the Apaches in Arizona. The total appropriation, therefore, for the present year has been $525,000. If any change should be made in the estimate for the service here it should be in the line of increase rather than decrease. The Indians to be subsisted from this appropriation number 9,548. Merely to ration them through the year, owing to the high prices necessarily paid in Arizona and New Mexico on account of the lack of transportation facilities, would cost nearly $600,000, while, if the reduction proposed by the committee in the incidental fund for those two Territories is carried out, the wording of the bill must be so changed as to provide for the support of five other agencies at which are congregated 23,070 Indians. Some of these Indians require to be subsisted throughout the year, most of which expense has hitherto been met by the incidental fund of the two Territories. Such a reduction would result in great danger to the frontier, and depredation and murder might fairly be expected.

The committee have reduced the subsistence for the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches, in the Indian Territory, (see page 48 of the bill,) from the $300,000 heretofore received to $250,000. Many of these Indians have heretofore been out hunting upon the staked plains and in the southwestern part of Kansas, but the disappearance of game and the complaint of settlers in that vicinity seem to render it advisable that they should be more closely confined to their reservation. If such strict confinement is insisted upon, they should certainly receive suitable supplies of rations at the agency, and in that event the amount heretofore appropriated is not excessive. Provision is also made in the bill for the removal to the Indian Territory of the northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes now at the Red Cloud agency among the Sioux. Should this removal be effected, the number of Indians to be subsisted from this appropriation would be increased from 8,221 to about 11,958, in which event the full appropriation asked for would probably be inadequate.

Upon the same page of the bill the appropriation for the Kansas Indians has been reduced from $10,000 to $5,000. I do not see how the educational needs of these Indians and their subsistence can be furnished for less than the amount estimated for.

The estimate for the Modocs now in the Indian Territory, one hundred and forty in number, was reduced from $7,000 to $5,000 by the committee; but the condition of these Indians seems to me to demand the very moderate estimate given.

The amount allowed for transportation is entirely inadequate. The amount estimated for was $219,200, which, with the exception of that for the Sioux, is used almost entirely for the transportation of annuity goods provided by treaty. The amount actually expended by the Office for transportation for the present year is nearly $300,000, and an appropriation for transportation to the full amount of the estimates will still leave somewhat to be made up from the funds provided for subsistence.

The following estimates (page 107 of the Book of Estimates) have received no attention at the hands of the committee. They should, in my judgment, be appropriated in whole or in part:

The Indians on the Malheur reservation cannot be properly cared for for a sum less than $30,000.

Unless money is provided for colonizing and supporting the Wichitas and other affiliated bands much good work of the agent there will be lost. In a report received from him this very month the statement is made that, with liberal provision for agricultural implements and tools, these Indians will be well-nigh self-supporting in a year or two longer.

No provision is made for the civilization and subsistence of Indians in the central superintendency. For this purpose $10,000 was appropriated for this year, and the present estimate is for $25,000. The $10,000 for this year has been supplemented to the extent of $11,000, if I am rightly informed, by contributions from the Friends, who have the superintendency under their special charge, and the whole amount of $21,000 has not been sufficient to keep open during the whole school year all the schools now in operation. The very favorable condition of the service in the central superintendency leads me to express the hope that all of the progress thus gained will not be lost by a failure to make the appropriation asked for this purpose. Some of the schools are now so crowded that scholars have actually to be turned away, while the interest of some of the lately roving tribes in education is steadily increasing.

In this connection I note that no provision is made for the civilization of Indians for which the estimate of $150,000 was submitted on page 106 of the estimates. The funds which heretofore have been available for this purpose are entirely exhausted, and it seems to me that the expenditure of funds for this purpose is essential to any proper advancement of the Indians, and, looking to the future, is a measure of wise economy even. This estimate is of too great importance to be entirely ignored, and the whole amount could very properly and profitably be used for this purpose. Upon such an appropriation depends the existence of forty-six industrial schools, attended by seventeen hundred and ninety-four pupils. When provision is made by treaty stipulations for the establishment of such schools, the appropriation is generally grossly inadequate and barely provides for the salaries of part of the teachers and the necessary books. This method of instruction by boarding-schools has thus far proved, though the most expensive yet the only successful and satisfactory method. For the building of Indian houses, opening of Indian farms, purchase of stock and farming implements, support of shops and mills, and instruction of Indian apprentices, large dependence must be placed on this fund.

Upon the estimate for the civilization of the Chippewas of Minnesota I do not know that more need be said than is found in the letter of Agent King upon the subject, of which I send inclosed a copy. This appropriation would be applied, if given, not only for the benefit of his Indians, but also for the Chippewas at two other agencies, in every one of which would the expenditure be equally advantageous.

In regard to the incidental expenses of the Indian service I cannot too strongly express my hope that more liberal appropriations will be made by Congress than are recommended in the bill. For this purpose the Office received last year $350,000. The estimates this year are for $410,000. No provision other than that from the incidental fund is made in the bill for three agencies in Arizona, for all of the agencies in California, Nevada, and Utah, for two agencies in New Mexico, for two in Washington Territory, and for three in Oregon. The same reasons urged on page 3 of this letter for the contingent fund of the Office apply with equal force here. This fund has been used to meet a lack of or insufficient appropriations in other directions, pay of employés, educational purposes, traveling expenses of agents and superintendents, and their other incidental expenses. The full report of its use for the last fiscal year will be found in House Executive Document No. 6 of the present session. I trust that the appropriations in this particular will receive very careful and liberal consideration.

Thus very briefly stated are some of the additions which I note to the bill. I make no doubt that a more careful consideration of the bill would develop other points not mentioned here and that with time for elaboration a much stronger statement could be made in criticism of the bill as it stands. I think, however, enough has been said to show the absolute need of larger appropriations in many directions and that the service will be sadly crippled if no amendments are made to the bill. I trust the subject may receive your careful consideration.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. Q. SMITH, Commissioner.

Hon. CHARLES FOSTER,
House of Representatives.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 870) to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. PETER WRIGHT AND SONS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There is a bill on the Calendar which has passed the House and been reported favorably with the unanimous concurrence of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. I move that it be taken up and considered at the present time. It is House bill No. 2826.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2826) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to Peter Wright & Sons, of Philadelphia, the amount of duties paid by them upon the entry of three thousand and fifty bags of potato farina, imported per ships Vaderland and Nederland in the months of April and June, 1874, and to remit any claim on the part of the United States for duties upon three hundred bags of the same, entered by the same parties in December, 1873, and February, 1874, which had been admitted to entry free of duty; but from the amount of duties paid there shall be deducted an amount equal to all the profits which had been realized by Peter Wright & Sons upon the sale of the article so imported, to be ascertained as the Secretary shall direct.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFERS OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DAVIS. Yesterday morning from the Committee on Appropriations, I proposed to report a House bill providing for the transfer of certain small items of appropriation for the Department of Justice from one fund to another. The passage of the bill is requested by the Attorney-General. It has passed the House, and been favorably considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. I now report the bill and ask for its present consideration. I think there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 3479) making certain transfers of appropriations in the provisions for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice for the current year was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It amends the provision for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice in the act approved March 3, 1875, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1876, by transferring to the appropriation for miscellaneous expenditure the following sums from other specific appropriations: $300 from the appropriation for "furniture and repairs," $300 from the appropriation for "care and subsistence of horses," and $200 from the appropriation for "repairs to carriages and harness," making the amount so transferred $800.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, (at five o'clock and twenty-one minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 26, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LOUISIANA INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the resolution which I send to the desk, and after it is read I desire to make a brief statement in regard to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Louisiana Investigating Committee while in New Orleans have authority to designate subcommittees to take testimony in the matters under investigation by them by authority of the House, and such subcommittees when appointed shall be committees of the House for that purpose, and the member first named thereon shall be chairman thereof.

Mr. KASSON. In the hurry of the adoption the other day of the resolution in regard to the Louisiana Investigating Committee I endeavored to get the attention of the House to the fact that it did not comply with the provisions of the Revised Statutes. I failed in that endeavor. I have now brought the resolution within the provisions of the Revised Statutes, which are as follows:

The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of the Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

Consequently it is necessary that such subcommittees should not, by our resolution be authorized to administer oaths, for we have not that power to confer. The power can only be conferred in compliance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes by declaring the subcommittees to be committees of the House. Then the law declares that the chairman of such a committee may administer oaths, &c.

I have submitted the resolution to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] who is a member of that committee, and to my colleague from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY,] who tells me it is right, and that this is substantially what they found themselves obliged to do in the last Congress under similar circumstances. For the purpose, therefore, of making a correct precedent, I move that this resolution be adopted, and that the other be rescinded.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. Does this resolution come from the Louisiana Investigating Committee?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from New York will see that this is the same thing in purpose and effect with the other resolution; but it brings it within the provisions of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. RANDALL. There is just one point about it; I wish to know whether the Louisiana Committee presents this resolution or whether it comes from an individual member?

Mr. KASSON. The resolution has been prepared by myself for the purpose of giving that power of taking testimony under the obligation of an oath.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not understand that the committee asks for any additional power.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe from what I have said that this gives no additional power. It is to give them the power they sought by the other resolution which they failed to get.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the resolution may be referred to that committee.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman will hear me out.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. The committee will ask what they want.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

Mr. KASSON. Then I want to say that in case of indictment for perjury the person sworn cannot be convicted.

Mr. RANDALL. I thought there was some ulterior object to be reached by it.

Mr. KASSON. The object is to make a witness swearing falsely liable to conviction for perjury.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee will take care to ask for what they want.

Mr. KASSON. Then let the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. DUNNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3573) to amend an act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, approved December 28, 1874; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It extends for one year after the expiration of the time named in the act for the relief of certain settlers upon the public lands, approved December 28, 1874, all the rights and privileges granted by said act.

Mr. DUNNELL. This act has the approval of the Committee on Public Lands, and is intended to grant another year of privilege and of grace to those counties in my own State and some others that have been afflicted by the locusts. I trust there will be no objection to it.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read again.

The bill was again read.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will give some explanation of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have already given an explanation which I thought sufficient.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TROOPS STATIONED IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be respectfully directed to furnish to the House of Representatives, at the earliest practicable moment, a statement of the number of troops now stationed in the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, and of what arm of the service; where they are stationed, and for what purpose; giving the whole number, and also the names of the various regiments and companies.

Mr. KASSON. Let that lie over for a day.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the resolution.

SEAL-LOCKS ON BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information and papers in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives dated April 4, 1876, calling for copies of contracts relating to seal-locks on bonded warehouses, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commences, and the regular order for this day is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature. The morning hour commences at twenty-two minutes after twelve o'clock.

Mr. HOPKINS. The unfinished business pending last Friday I now call up. There was a bill pending last Friday which was not disposed of, and which is the unfinished business of to-day.

The SPEAKER. That bill is on the Speaker's table as unfinished business, and at the close of the morning hour it will come up and be the first business in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. Would it be in order now to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the House on this day to make any order not inconsistent to the rules; it is competent for the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRIGHT. I give notice, then, that at the close of the morning hour I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Why not make the motion now?

Mr. BRIGHT. There are some committees which want to report private bills to-day.

The SPEAKER. Then the call of committees will commence, and the call rests now with the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER proceeded to call the committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the petition of Susan W. Marshall, of Baltimore, Maryland, for a pension; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOSHUA C. STODDARD.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3585) for the relief of Joshua C. Stoddard, of Worcester, Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to ask that this bill be now considered.

The bill authorizes Joshua C. Stoddard, of Worcester, Massachusetts, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent granted to him under date of October 9, 1855, for a steam instrument called the calliope for a term of seven years from and after the passage of the act, such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the application had been for the first time filed in less than ninety days before the expiration of the original term of the patent; and upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner and with the same effect as if the application had for the first time been duly filed within the time prescribed by law and as if the original term of said patent had not expired; and no person shall be held liable for an infringement of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term and prior to the date of the extension, nor for the use of any such instrument or machine made prior to the passage of the act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I hope the gentleman will explain this bill.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. There is a report accompanying the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the report be read.

The report was read. It states that the application by Joshua C. Stoddard is for an extension of letters-patent, granted to him October 9, 1855, for a steam musical instrument called a calliope. Under the law, as it then stood, at the time of the granting of said letters-patent the patentee was entitled to an extension of seven years. This petitioner, under that law, was entitled to such extension, and applied for the same as required by law. The application was rejected by the Commissioner of Patents for want of evidence, the lack of which was not known to the applicant before the case was thus decided.

The facts in the case may be briefly stated as follows: The inventor in order to raise funds to experiment with and perfect this instrument was obliged to dispose of one-half of his interest. A joint stock company was then formed. The law of the State of Massachusetts required that a certain sum of money should be paid in. The inventor's means were already exhausted, and he could not pay in on the interest still held by him. This remaining interest was then required of him, at the instance of a few of the stockholders who had assumed control, they representing that they would be responsible for his capital stock. After this assignment these men managed to buy up enough shares to force a sale, and though the inventor found parties to buy in his interest, he was refused an opportunity to sell it at any price. In this manner the inventor lost his entire interest, and sunk beyond recovery his entire means.

There is now an opportunity for him to exhibit this instrument at the centennial exhibition as a great novelty, and as an American invention the only one of its character in the world; and he will be enabled to induce moneyed parties to become interested and make this exhibition, if the letters-patent will be extended; and also be enabled to manufacture and sell for his own benefit, as in an extension of these letters-patent the extended time will go entirely to the patentee. It may not be amiss to state that this extension is not opposed by any parties whatsoever, and involves no conflicting interest. Under the circumstances the committee feel that it is but an act of simple justice that the inventor should be granted his petition, and they recommend the passage of a bill, that the inventor may be enabled to make the necessary preparation for the centennial exhibition.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SAYLER.) This bill comes from the Committee on Patents. Does the gentleman desire to have it recommitted?

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I trust that the gentleman will raise no objection to this bill. It is a simple matter of justice to this man, who wants to go before the Commissioner of Patents for the purpose of presenting his case. It is a case in which the public is very little interested. There is no earthly reason why the bill should not pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NICHOLAS WHITEHALL.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3181) for the relief of Nicholas Whitehall, of Fountain County, Indiana; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL A. KNOX.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY also, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Samuel A. Knox for extension of letters-patent No. 15887, granted October 14, 1856; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

E. C. STEVENS.

Mr. FORT. I am directed by the Committee of Accounts to report back the following resolution, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to insert the necessary provision in one of the appropriation bills:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to E. C. Stevens one month's salary as folder, for service rendered during the month of February, 1875.

These services were rendered, and the committee believe they ought to be paid for.

The motion of Mr. FORT was agreed to.

V. H. M'CORMICK.

Mr. FORT. The Committee of Accounts have also instructed me to report back the claim of V. H. McCormick for services as messenger to the Committee Investigating the Affairs of the Freedman's Bank, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to make the necessary provision for the payment of the claim.

The motion was agreed to.

G. B. TYLER AND E. H. LUCKETT—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

Mr. COX. I understand that this is a veto bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So the Chair is just informed.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. I move that this bill be now taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is, Shall the bill again pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President?

The bill, with the accompanying message from the Senate, was read, as follows:

An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, the sum of $164, in full for moneys wrongfully collected from said Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1869, and January, 1870.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

I certify that this act did originate in the Senate.

GEO. C. GORHAM, Secretary.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 20, 1876.

The President of the United States having returned to the Senate, in which it originated, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham," with his objections thereto, the Senate proceeded, in pursuance of the Constitution, to reconsider the same, and resolved that the said bill do pass, two-thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

Attest: GEORGE C. GORHAM, Secretary.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I suppose that under the rules the veto message of the President should be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was read when the bill was referred, but it will be read again if the gentleman desires it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I do not know that there is any occasion to read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury unless it be demanded by some member.

Mr. FORT. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. The Committee of Claims of the House adopted the report of the Senate committee that reported this bill to that body, and I ask that the same be now read.

The Clerk read, as follows, the report of the Senate Committee on Claims:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States returning, with his objections, the bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, having duly considered the same, beg respectfully to report the said bill back to the Senate, with the recommendation that it pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

The veto power is one lodged in the Executive by the Constitution as a means of protection to the people against the evil consequences of vicious legislation, resulting, as it sometimes does, from hasty or inconsiderate legislative action; and, although the power exists in Congress to breathe the breath of statutory life into a bill once passed, notwithstanding the President's objections, it is a power that should never be exercised except after the most careful consideration of the reasons given by the Executive for withholding his approval. As a power approaching, as does the veto power under our Constitution, so nearly to that exercised without restraint by the heads of despotic governments should never be exercised except on the fullest consideration of the case and where the objections are clearly apparent, so with equal care and deliberation should Congress undertake to say that a bill which the President, for reasons given, says ought not to become a law shall become such.

Impressed with these considerations, your committee have given this case a most thorough investigation, and have come to the unanimous opinion that the veto message of the President is based upon an entire misapprehension of the facts.

The bill is a private one for the relief of two citizens of the State of Kentucky, G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham. The amount involved is $164.

The bill, as it passed both Houses of Congress, is in the following words:

An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham, the sum of $164, in full for moneys wrongfully collected from said Cheatham by the internal-revenue collector for the second district of the State of Kentucky in 1870, as a tax for keeper of bonded warehouse in December, 1869, and January, 1870.

MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The report of the Senate committee, upon which favorable action was had, reads as follows:

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of W. T. Cheatham, praying to be re-imbursed for certain moneys wrongfully paid to the Government as a distiller of whisky, in Kentucky, have had the same under consideration, and beg to submit the following report:

"William T. Cheatham was engaged in the manufacture of whisky in Daviess County, Kentucky, in the year 1869; that petitioners were his bondsmen to the Government as such distiller; that on the 14th day of December, A. D., 1869, said Cheatham permanently discontinued his said distillery, and all taxes and charges then due on all liquors in bond were then tendered to the collector of internal revenue by Cheatham, having sold all said liquor to third parties; and on that day notice of such permanent discontinuance was filed in the office of the United States assessor of the second district of Kentucky, in which district said distillery was located; that the collector of said district wrongfully refused to issue permits to the purchasers of said whisky for the removal of the same from the bonded warehouse for a period of fifteen days, in December, 1869, and twenty-six days in 1870, in all forty-one days, during which period of forty-one days said Cheatham was wrongfully assessed the salary of a store-keeper of said bonded warehouse, to wit, $4 per day, amounting in all to the sum of $164, which amount said Cheatham afterward, in December, 1870, paid to the collector of internal revenue for said district; that, in consideration of moneys advanced by petitioners to said Cheatham and for his benefit, he, Cheatham, transferred to petitioners all his right to such moneys so wrongfully collected and the right to collect the same.

"Wherefore your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage."

The veto message of the President is very brief, and in these words:

To the Senate of the United States:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, I have the honor to return herewith, without my approval, Senate bill No. 489, entitled "An act for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 31, 1876.

It will be observed that the only reasons given by the President for the exercise of the veto power in this case are, to use his language, those "set forth in an accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Treasury."

This accompanying communication of the Secretary of the Treasury is in the following words:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 30, 1876.

To the PRESIDENT:

Referring to the letter of the 25th instant, written by your direction, transmitting Senate bill No. 489, "for the relief of G. B. Tyler and E. H. Luckett, assignees of William T. Cheatham," and requesting my opinion as to the propriety of its approval by you, I have to say that there are no data on file in the Department, so far as I can learn, which indicate that the amount it is proposed by this bill to refund to the assignees of Mr. Cheatham was wrongfully collected or that the amount should be refunded.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his report to me in reference to the matter, says:

"The re-imbursement to the United States by said Cheatham of salary paid to this store-keeper by the collector of internal revenue for the months of December, 1869, and January, 1870, was in accordance with the provisions of joint resolution of March 29, 1869, (Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 52) and there appears to be no reason for the refunding by the United States to the assignees of said Cheatham the salary of this store-keeper that would not apply with equal force to similar payments by all other distillers who were operating their distilleries or had spirits in their warehouses at that time.

"The facts above stated are considered by this Office valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill, and they would have been communicated to the congressional committees before the passage of the bill had they called the attention of this Office to the subject."

The bill is herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. H. BRISTOW, Secretary.

Relying, as the President did, on this letter of his Secretary, to whom the bill had been referred for his "opinion as to the propriety of its approval" by the President, it is not surprising that the executive sanction was withheld.

But the question arises, how far was the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury justified by the facts in the case and are the statements contained in the report of Commissioner Pratt, which constitutes a part of the Secretary's communication, in accordance with the record of his own Bureau?

The Commissioner asserts in his report that "there appears to be no reason for the refunding by the United States to the assignees of said Cheatham the salary of this store-keeper that would not apply with equal force to similar payments by all other distillers who were operating their distilleries or had spirits in their warehouses at that time."

And the Secretary of the Treasury, referring to this report of Commissioner Pratt, advises the President that "the facts above stated are considered by this Office valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill," and concludes his communication to the President with the declaration "that they," the above facts, "would have been communicated to the congressional committees before the passage of the bill had they called the attention of this Office to the subject."

That the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury had been called to this subject in the most solemn and formal manner possible, and the opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equities of the case asked and such opinion given, and that, too, favorable to the equities of the parties claiming relief, will be seen from the following records of the Senate and letters from the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

This subject was before the Forty-third Congress. On the 5th day of January, 1874, Senator MCCREERY, of Kentucky, submitted to the Senate the following resolution, which was on that day unanimously agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish to the Senate the papers on file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, with an opinion from said Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of a drawback of $164 alleged to have been improperly and unlawfully collected by the revenue officers of said district."

On the 15th of January, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to the above resolution, addressed to the then President pro tempore the following communication, accompanied with a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which is also here given:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1874.

SIR: as requested in the Senate resolution of the 5th instant, I herewith transmit the papers in the case of W. T. Cheatham, distiller in the second district of Kentucky, together with an opinion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the equity of refunding to the said Cheatham the sum of $164.

Very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON, Secretary.

Hon. M. H. CARPENTER,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

The letter of the Commissioner is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1874.

SIR: In response to the inclosed resolution of the Senate, I herewith transmit to you the original application on form 46 of E. H. Luckett and G. B. Tyler, assignees and sureties on the distiller's bond of William T. Cheatham, of the second district of Kentucky, together with all the papers accompanying said application, asking to have refunded the sum of $164. It appears from the correspondence of this Office with Collector J. R. Rend that William T. Cheatham was in arrears for taxes due from him as distiller; but if it shall, however, be shown that all the whisky in bond had been sold to bona fide purchasers and that the taxes due thereon had been tendered to the collector prior to the 14th day of December, 1869, (the day of permanent discontinuance of said William T. Cheatham's distillery,) and before seizure and distraint, then I am of opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery.

Very respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS, Commissioner.

Hon. W. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

It will be perceived from this letter that the Commissioner submits a question of fact, and then declares in the most positive terms that, if this question is found a certain way, then it is his "opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery."

That is to say, the Commissioner declares that "it appears from the correspondence of this Office with Collector J. R. Rend that William T. Cheatham was in arrears for taxes due him as distiller." But says the Commissioner further:

"But if it shall, however, be shown that all the whisky in bond had been sold to bona fide purchasers and that the taxes due thereon had been tendered to the collector prior to the 14th day of December, 1869, (the day of permanent discontinuance of said William T. Cheatham's distillery,) and before seizure and distraint, then I am of opinion that William T. Cheatham has an equitable claim to have refunded to him the amount paid by him for store-keeper's salary after the permanent discontinuance of his distillery."

In reference to this question, your committee did find as a matter of fact in their former report upon this bill, and they now find—and the evidence is convincing and undisputed—that William T. Cheatham had, prior to December 14, 1869, (the date of permanent discontinuance of his distillery; and that is a matter of record,) and before any seizure or distraint, sold all the whisky in bond to bona fide purchasers, and that he had also on said day, December 14, 1869, tendered to the collector of internal revenue all taxes and charges due thereon. Your committee then found, and now find, the existence of a state of facts in reference to this case upon which, if found, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue declared an equity would be created in favor of the relief awarded by the bill under consideration.

To recapitulate: By the provisions of joint resolution of Congress of March 29, 1869, (volume 16, Statutes at Large, page 52,) entitled "A joint resolution to supply omissions in the enrollment of certain appropriation acts," approved March 3, 1869, it was provided as follows:

"That after the passage of this act the proprietors of all internal-revenue bonded warehouses shall re-imburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all store-keepers or other officers in charge of such warehouses, and the same shall be paid into the Treasury and accounted for like other public moneys."

William T. Cheatham was engaged in the business of manufacturing whisky in Daviess County, Kentucky. On the 14th day of December, 1869, he permanently discontinued his distillery, and all taxes and charges then due on all liquors in bond were by him then tendered to the collector of internal revenue, he, Cheatham, having, prior to that date, sold all said liquor to third parties, bona fide purchasers; that the collector of said district wrongfully refused to issue permits to the purchasers of said whisky for the removal of the same from the bonded warehouse for a period of fifteen days in December, 1869, and twenty-six days in 1870, in all forty-one days, during which time of forty-one days Cheatham was wrongfully assessed the salary of a store-keeper of said bonded warehouse, to wit, $4 per day, amounting in all to the sum of $164, which amount said Cheatham paid to the collector, and the same has been paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The petitioners, Tyler and Luckett, were Cheatham's bondsmen to the Government as such distiller; that in consideration of moneys advanced by Tyler and Luckett to said Cheatham, and for his benefit, he, Cheatham, transferred to them all his right to such moneys so wrongfully collected, and the right to collect the same.

This amount, then, of $164 was wrongfully collected from William T. Cheatham, and the United States Treasury has received the money.

It is not the case where a party has suffered by the wrongful act of a public officer, and where the Government has reaped no benefit; it is just the reverse. By the wrongful act of the collector Mr. Cheatham was compelled to pay wrongfully $164, which money, so wrongfully collected, went into the public Treasury, and it (the Treasury) has become, so to speak, the receptacle of money of a private citizen to just that amount, and by every rule of equity and good morals it should disgorge. This is the true statement of this case, free from all exaggeration or embellishment. And so far from there being, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, "valid and serious objections to the approval of this bill," there is not an objection that can be successfully urged against it, while equity and good conscience and public morals unite in its support. Again, it is not the fact that the Treasury Department was not consulted, but, as has been shown, its opinion was solicited and received in the most formal manner known to the proceedings of the Senate in such cases.

Your committee therefore beg, respectfully, to submit—

First. That the bill is one that commends itself to the favorable consideration of the Senate, and should become a law.

Second. That it was not hastily or inconsiderately passed, or without asking for and receiving information from the Treasury Department on the subject.

Thirdly. That the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon which the veto of the President rests, was evidently written, as was also the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in a hasty and inconsiderate manner, and in a way calculated to mislead, and which evidently did mislead, the President.

Had these officials but consulted the records of their respective offices, the letter of the Hon. Secretary of the Treasury would not, as it does, have contained an implied censure of the Committees on Claims of Senate and House for not, as he states, calling attention of his office to the subject.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the facts of the case as here presented, respectfully report back Senate bill No. 489, with the unanimous recommendation that it pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President? Under the Constitution, the vote upon this question must necessarily be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. In this connection I desire to say a few words. The facts of this case are so clearly and fully set forth in the report just read that I do not consider any restatement of them necessary at my hands.

There is in this matter no partisan question whatever.

The claimants ask the payment of $164, which they assert the Government has wrongfully received. This bill for their relief passed both the Senate and House of Representatives, and was vetoed by the President. Upon its reconsideration by the Senate on the vote as to whether the bill should pass notwithstanding the objections of the President, there was not a dissenting voice in that body. The veto of the President was purely an inadvertence, founded upon a mistake of the Secretary of the Treasury, as is fully shown in the report which has just been read. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 181, nays 14, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Banks, Banning, Beebe, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced the passage of the following bills without amendments:

An act (H. R. No. 2826) to refund and remit certain duties to Peter Wright & Sons; and

An act (H. R. No. 3479) making certain transfers of appropriations in the provisions for the contingent expenses of the Department of Justice for the current year.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 755) for the relief of Jackson T. Sorrells; and

An act (H. R. No. 2459) for the relief of Theodore F. Miller, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers.

ELECTION OF DOORKEEPER.

Mr. TEESE. I rise to a privileged question, and ask the adoption of the following resolution.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the call of committees for reports of a private nature will go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the gentleman from New Jersey, as the Chair understands, rises to a question of privilege affecting the organization of the House.

Mr. TEESE. I ask that my resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John H Patterson, a citizen of the State of New Jersey, be, and he is hereby, elected Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress, for the unexpired term thereof.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. TEESE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TEESE. The Doorkeeper who has just been elected is present, and I ask that he be sworn in.

Mr. PATTERSON presented himself at the Clerk's desk and was qualified by taking the usual oath.

RECORDING DEEDS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith without my approval House bill No. 1922, entitled "An act providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia."

The objection to affixing my signature to this bill may be found in the communication addressed to me by the Attorney-General, and which accompanies this message.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 26, 1876.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter of the Attorney-General accompanying the message.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, May 23, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 19th instant, in which you request me to report whether there are objections to your approval of "an act providing for the recording of deeds, mortgages, and other conveyances affecting real estate in the District of Columbia," being House bill No. 1922, I have the honor to state that the bill seems to me objectionable because of indefiniteness and uncertainty as to the time which it purports to fix when deeds of trust, mortgages, &c., shall take effect and be valid as to creditors and subsequent purchasers for valuable consideration without notice.

Although there is no constitutional objection to the act, yet for the reason above stated I hesitate to advise its approval.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARDS PIERREPONT,
Attorney-General.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move that the message of the President be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS REPORTED BY COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, but yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the gentleman not to insist on the regular order until I explain to the House my object in rising.

Mr. RANDALL. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EDEN. I ask the House by unanimous consent to take up for consideration now the bill (H. R. No. 3359) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, and for other purposes. This bill has already been made a special order but has not been reached.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for information.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. EDEN. I ask that the reading of the schedule of claims be dispensed with, and that the bill be taken up and considered in the House. There are some amendments authorized by the committee which I desire to have read, after which I will make a brief explanation of the bill and answer any questions any gentleman may see fit to ask. I think there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question whether there is any item in that bill except such as have received the judgment of the commissioners of claims upon them?

Mr. EDEN. There is no item in the bill except what has been allowed by the commissioners of claims, and there are a number of items allowed by the commissioners which are not in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. In other words, a portion of the claims which they allowed you have disallowed, but you have allowed none that they did not allow.

Mr. EDEN. We have not allowed any that they did not allow, and this is the unanimous report of the committee. Unless it is acted on speedily there will not be time for the Senate to act upon it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

No objection was made.

Mr. EDEN. I offer the following amendments:

On page 10, line 211, strike out "Joy" and insert "Ivy."
Same page, line 213, strike out "Joy" and insert "Ivy."
On page 11 strike out lines 247, 248, and 249 and insert the following:

the sum of $200; and to Mrs. Sarah L. Barton the sum of $400; and to Sarah and Mary Merriweather, heirs of Joseph Merriweather, deceased, the sum of $1,470."

On page 13 strike out lines 306, 307, and 308.

On page 15, line 304, strike out "Prine" and insert "Prince."

On page 21, at the end of line 488, add "deceased."

On page 23, at the end of line 538, strike out "Conke" and insert "Cocke."

On page 33 strike out lines 783 and 784.

On same page, in line 798, strike out "eighty" and insert "fifty."

On page 40 strike out lines 954 and 955.

On same page, line 971, strike out the word "Caton" and insert the word "Carter."

On page 43, line 1051, strike out the word "Electia" and insert the word "Elécty."

On page 44 strike out lines 1069 and 1070 and insert "$1,960.14."

On page 50, line 1204, after the word "Pierce" insert the word "deceased."

On page 50 strike out lines 1214 and 1215.

Also a substitute for section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the cases of Robert S. Lacey, Hampton N. Webb, William H. Brisby, Nathaniel P. Harbin, and Robert Hoodenpyle be, and they are hereby, referred to the commissioners of claims for re-examination and report; and the said commissioners of claims shall have full jurisdiction and authority to re-open, examine, and consider the said cases provided for in the second section of the act authorizing the appointment of the said commissioners, approved March 3, 1871; and the following proviso be inserted in line 35, page 2, after the word cents: Provided, That no payment be made to or on account of the said John M. Brown until settlement be made of any indebtedness lawfully and equitably due from him to the United States, and evidenced by judgment duly recovered against him by the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRIGHT. I cannot yield further; the gentleman probably will have an opportunity to get his resolution in during the day.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman will yield to allow the resolution to be offered; it will take but a moment.

Mr. BRIGHT. Well, I will yield.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I find an article in the Baltimore Gazette, which, as the author of the bill to carry into effect the Hawaiian treaty, I cannot fail to notice. It states that there is here from the Pacific coast a lobby for the Hawaiian treaty. I desire to know who compose that lobby. I am sure that not one member of the California delegation knows anything about it, and I offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the following article appeared in the columns of the Baltimore Gazette of the 26th instant, to wit:

"WHAT CHRISTIAN STATESMAN GOT THIS MONEY?

["Special dispatch to the Gazette.]

"WASHINGTON, May 25.

"It was asserted to-day at the Capitol that the Pacific coast lobby expended $300,000 in securing the passage through the House of the bill giving effect to the Hawaiian treaty. The names of the recipients of a portion of this money were given. It appears that the actual exports from the Hawaiian Islands are of less importance than the privilege it will give to successfully carry on smuggling on a large scale. The matter will probably be investigated and an opportunity given to show where the money was put to do the most good;"

Therefore be it resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, instructed to immediately summon the author of the above special dispatch to appear before said committee to answer such questions as they may put to him as to the truth or falsity of said dispatch, and to make such further investigation in the matter as the said committee may deem proper.

Mr. LUTTRELL. One word more. I desire the fullest investigation of this matter, and if there is any one who can bring forward the slightest testimony that any person from the Pacific coast has used money or has been lobbying here in favor of the bill, or that there is a job in it, I am anxious that it may be defeated in the Senate.

The preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would suggest that the resolution be amended so as to give the committee power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the business upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. HUNTON. On the last private bill day there was before the House a bill (H. R. No. 219) providing for the retirement of Judge McCandless, of Pennsylvania. The bill was partly considered, and should come up now as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The bill was under consideration at the time the House adjourned, and comes over as unfinished business upon this private bill day. It is competent for the House now to proceed with the consideration of that bill, or to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HUNTON. I would ask that the House finish the consideration of that bill.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SAYLER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the business upon the Private Calendar; and this being the fourth Friday of the month, is what is known as objection day. The Clerk will proceed with the bills upon the Calendar from the point reached on last objection day.

EMERICK W. HANSELL.

The first business on the Private Calendar for to-day was the bill (H. R. No. 3184) granting a pension to Emerick W. Hansell.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Emerick W. Hansell, of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, at the rate of $8 per month, commencing on the 14th day of April, 1865, on account of injuries received by said Hansell while in attendance upon the late William H. Seward, former Secretary of State, on the occasion of the attempted assassination of said Seward.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know from what committee this bill was reported. It seems strange to me that the man who performed these services has not been paid before this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Unless I understand it I must object to it.

Mr. TARBOX. I wish the gentleman would permit the report to be read; I think that would obviate any objection he might have to the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. TARBOX,] who has examined this bill, says it is all right, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. TARBOX. I think the bill is right.

There being no further objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY GEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2258) for the relief of Henry Gee, of the State of Florida, reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, authorizes Henry Gee, of the State of Florida, or his legal representatives, to relocate the special certificate issued to him on any public lands in the State of Florida, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. MOREY. There is a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands report House bill No. 2258 favorably, and submit the following letter from the Commissioner of the General Land-Office in support of the passage of the bill, and in the nature of a report in favor of the same:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1875.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of 6th ultimo and two inclosures, relative to the claim of Henry Gee, under the act of August 11, 1842, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Gee," (Statutes, volume 6, page 857, Private Laws,) and requesting such instructions as will place you "in possession of the warrant."

The facts in the case are as follows: The act of 1842, before referred to, authorized Henry Gee, of Florida, to locate, on any of the unappropriated public lands within the Territory of Florida, the same number of acres of land which was contained in the northeast quarter of fractional section 23, in township 1 north, of range 8 west, of which he was deprived by the entry of Michael Lott, made at the land office at Tallahassee, Florida, August 20, 1840.

Our records show that the quantity of land which said Gee was authorized to locate under the provisions of the act in question was 126.19 acres, and that a location was made, in supposed conformity therewith, in township 20 south, of range 30 east, Florida, the same being designated as section 39, containing one hundred and twenty-six acres; but it appears by an examination of the official plat of said township that said location is entirely within the survey of the private land claim of Moses E. Levy, confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1834, and is consequently void and of no effect.

It is understood by this Office that your present object is to effect a new location, and for that purpose you request to be placed in possession of the "warrant."

The manner of proceeding which seems to have been adopted, under private acts of Congress, relative to the disposal of the public domain, was to issue a special certificate, addressed to the register and receiver of any land office in the State in which the act authorized the land to be located, certifying as to the facts in the case, and authorizing those officers to permit a location to be made as provided for in the particular act; and it is therefore presumed that the term warrant used in your letter has reference to a special certificate, although we have no evidence that such a certificate was ever prepared in this case.

Admitting, however, that such a certificate was prepared in this case and that this Office was advised as to its whereabouts, yet it would be impracticable at this time to give instructions looking to its relocation; because, first, the location, according to the terms of the act of 1842, is confined to any "unappropriated public lands within the Territory of Florida;" second, by the act of June 21, 1866, (Statutes, volume 14, page 66,) the disposal of the public lands in the State of Florida is restricted to homestead actual settlement, thereby prohibiting any proceedings, under the said act of 1842, subsequent to the said act of 1866.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. S. BURDETT, Commissioner.

W. H. GEE, Esq., Quincy, Florida.

There being no objection, the amendments reported from the Committee on Public Lands were agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

NEWTON S. MURPHEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2638) for the relief of Newton S. Murphey, reported with an amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, appropriates to Newton S. Murphey the sum of $1,000 as compensation for his services in defending three suits against internal-revenue officers of the United States in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report in this case be read.

The report was read.

Mr. RANDALL. The sum appropriated by this bill is not large, but the bill involves what I deem to be an abuse.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that under the rule no debate is in order. Does the gentleman object to the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want arbitrarily to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to rule that no discussion of the bill is in order. If there is objection to the bill it must be passed over; if not, it will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. RANDALL. When will I have an opportunity to discuss this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman objects now, the bill will be passed over and come up again in its regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will have to object, for the bill involves the employment of counsel outside of the officers of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3185) for the relief of Joseph R. Shannon.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph R. Shannon, of the city of New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, the sum of $18,800 in full compensation for balance due for the use and loss of the steamer Burton while employed in the military service of the United States.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read.

(Mr. HENDEE objected to the bill, and it was passed over.)

PHILIP PENDLETON.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton, reported with amendments from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to re-open and re-adjust the accounts of Philip Pendleton, late a paymaster in the United States Army, and allow him such additional credits in the settlement of his accounts as under the circumstances or in the opinion of said accounting officers may be just and equitable for errors and losses of money received by him as such paymaster, if any, growing out of shorts in package of money received by him, which shall be established before them by satisfactory evidence.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 735) for the relief of Philip Pendleton, report—

That a bill for the relief of Major Pendleton was reported favorably by the House Committee of Claims in the Forty-second Congress, and the bill was reported by Mr. Blair, chairman of the committee, and passed the House. (See Journal third session Forty-second Congress, page 371.)

The bill went to the Senate, was not reached in that Congress, and the papers were returned to the House files. In the last Congress the claim was again presented, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but no action was had, as the papers were withdrawn by petitioner, on leave of the House, April 17, 1874.

The report cannot be found on the files of the House or with the papers.

It appears from the evidence that Major Pendleton was appointed a paymaster in the United States Army in the early part of 1861, and served as such until the month of August, 1864. That during that time he disbursed very large sums of money in payment of troops in West Virginia, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, and Colorado. Much of the duty performed was done under the most trying circumstances. He was in many instances (scarcely ever otherwise, according to the evidence before this committee) ordered to start at once on expeditions to pay troops without being given time to count the funds turned over to him. He was compelled to take the packages of money for the sums marked on them and receipt for such sums, as thus marked, without any opportunity of opening the packages and counting the money to verify their correctness before so receipting. In some instances the packages fell considerably short of the amount they were supposed to contain. Owing to the excitement of the times, and the continual and rapid changes from one place to another, Major Pendleton had no opportunity offered him to have these errors corrected. By the statement of Comptroller Brodhead, as well as that of the claimant and others, it was notorious that many errors occurred in the Treasury Department in putting up and marking packages of money; that such errors were inevitable and unavoidable by reason of the hurry of putting up the packages and the enormous business transacted at the time. Major Pendleton reported these errors to the Paymaster-General at various times, claiming that he had accounted for every dollar he had received, and that he was, by reason of the amounts receipted for by him, apparently behind in his accounts, when in fact he had not received all the moneys so receipted for. After the close of the war Major Pendleton tried to have his accounts settled; the war excitement was then over, and the Department was not disposed to allow credits without the strictest compliance with law. Although he had reported deficits, he was held to his receipts hurriedly given. By the accounts Major Pendleton appeared to be indebted $14,374.50. The petitioner alleges and urges that there are errors in the account and settlement with the Secretary of the Treasury greatly to his injury, and prays for leave to have his accounts referred and re-adjusted by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

Your committee, therefore, after a careful consideration of the case—the confusion of the times, the haste and emergencies under which the Secretary was forced to transact the business of his Department, and the risks and difficulties encountered by disbursing officers in keeping their accounts while in the field and on active duty, in a business-like manner—are of the opinion that Major Pendleton ought to be allowed the privilege of a resettlement of his accounts before the Secretary of the Treasury, and respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended.

There being no objection, the amendments reported from the Committee on War Claims were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARK DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 402) for the relief of Mark Davis.

The bill was read.

(Objected to by Mr. LAWRENCE.)

J. M. BRAGG AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 877) for the relief of J. M. Bragg and others, in Tennessee.

The bill was read.

(Objected to by Mr. LAWRENCE.)

MARGARET JANET BURLESON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3186) for the relief of Margaret Janet Burleson.

The bill was read. It provides that the commissioners of claims be given jurisdiction of the claim of Margaret Janet Burleson, of Memphis, Tennessee, formerly of Decatur, Alabama, to inquire into and report to the House of Representatives what commissary and quartermaster's stores were taken from her place in Decatur, Alabama, by the Federal Army, for commissary and quartermaster's uses, in and prior to the year 1864, provided that she satisfactorily proves to the commissioners that she was always a loyal woman, and that she held in her own right, distinctly and separately from that of her husband, the property so taken for the above-named purposes by the Federal forces.

The report was read, as follows:

The case of Margaret Janet Burleson, referred to the Committee on War Claims, contains the following claims for consideration: She resided at Decatur, Alabama, till the breaking out of the war, when she moved to Nashville, Tennessee; she is now a resident of Memphis. She represents that at the breaking out of the rebellion she was the sole owner of personal property and real estate which she inherited from her father, Alexander Pattison, and also received by gift from her brother, William Pattison. She further states that she had full control of said property, independent of interference from her husband.

The testimony in the case shows that the Federal forces took, for the use of the Army, certain commissary and quartermaster supplies.

The claimant produces testimony to prove that she was a loyal woman; it also shows that her husband was in the rebel army, and does not sufficiently prove that the property of her husband and that of her own were kept sufficiently separate to enable your committee to determine clearly what items in the claim they would be justified in allowing.

The testimony relative to loyalty being ex parte, your committee recommend that jurisdiction be given to the commissioners of claims to allow what the claimant may be able to prove as having been taken for commissary and quartermaster supplies, provided she proves her loyalty and separate ownership.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RANDALL BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 890) for the relief of Randall Brown, of Nashville, Tennessee.

The bill, with an amendment of the Committee on War Claims striking out "$1,600" and inserting "$1,500," was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Randall Brown, of Nashville, Tennessee, the sum of $1,500, for property taken by the rebel forces while the same was being used by the Government of the United States, to be shown upon proofs and vouchers.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 890) for the relief of Randall Brown, of Nashville, Tennessee, having had the same under consideration, report—

That the said Randall Brown is a colored man, a resident of Nashville, Tennessee; that during the late rebellion, in the year 1863, he was the owner of three teams, wagons, &c., and was employed with said teams, wagons, &c., on the forts then being constructed for the defense of Nashville, by the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army, with a promise or guarantee of protection against capture by the enemy; that during the month of July, 1863, while engaged with his teams in hauling wood to Overton's Station, on the Tennessee and Alabama Railroad, on the 3d of July, the rebel forces made a raid upon the hands engaged in hauling wood to said station, taking them prisoners and capturing several teams, among others the teams, wagons, &c., of the said Randall Brown.

The committee are of opinion that the claimant was entitled to the protection pledged him, and that the capture of said horses, wagons, &c., was without fault or negligence on the part of the said Brown; that the said horses, ten in number, were worth the sum of $125 each, the price paid for horses for the military service of the United States at that time; that the wagons and harness were worth the sum of $250; and these facts are clearly established by satisfactory evidence.

Your committee therefore report back the foregoing bill with the recommendation that the same be amended by inserting in line 5 the word "five" in place of "six," and that, as thus amended, the bill do pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MICHAEL W. BROCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 165) for the relief of Michael W. Brock, of Meigs County, Tennessee, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Volunteers.

The bill was read. It provides that, as it appears that Michael W. Brock, late a private in Company D, Tenth Tennessee Cavalry, is erroneously charged on the rolls of the company with a horse, horse-equipments, arms, &c., of the value of $225, Brock is relieved of all liability on account of those charges, and they shall have no effect against him, and that the record of the charges be corrected accordingly.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ALVIS SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 3) for the relief of Alvis Smith.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to pay to Alvis Smith, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, out of any money appropriated or which may hereafter be appropriated for the pay of the Army, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of cavalry, from the 10th of October, 1863, to the 8th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period as an enlisted man.

The report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

The proof shows that Alvis Smith was sworn into service as a second lieutenant of cavalry October 10, 1863 and attached to Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, and performed duty as such, under command and orders of John E. Phelps, colonel of said regiment; that, owing to absence of mustering officer, he was not regularly mustered in until the 8th of March, 1864, the mustering officer declining to date the muster back to October 10, 1863. The bill is to provide for payment for services as second lieutenant of cavalry for the intervening time.

As valuable services were rendered by said Smith in capacity as second lieutenant, he having been responsible for property, &c., and performing duty under the orders of the colonel of the regiment, the committee recommend passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

CHARLES C. CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 429) for the relief of Charles C. Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia.

The bill was read. As proposed to be amended by the Committee on War Claims, it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Charles C. Campbell, of Washington County, Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or that may be appropriated for that purpose, the sum of $6,000, for property taken and used as supplies by the armies of the United States, under Generals Stoneman and Burbridge, in the year 1864, while upon their marches in the States of Virginia and Tennessee; which sum is to be in full satisfaction of all claims of Campbell against the United States.

The amendments were adopted.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

NEW MADRID LOCATIONS IN MISSOURI.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 100) granting legal titles to all New Madrid locations in the State of Missouri for which patents have not heretofore been issued.

(Objected to by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.)

MRS. ELLEN J. BROSMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3273) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen J. Brosman.

The bill was read. It appropriates, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 in full payment of her claim against the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. E. J. Brosman, for goods seized by the provost marshal of the Army near Brandy Station, Virginia, &c., would report:

That after careful examination of the memorial and proofs, and personal examination of petitioner, they find that Ellen J. Brosman was loyal and devoted to the Union cause; that she was duly licensed by the levy court of the District of Columbia to trade as storekeeper to the Twentieth Army Corps, so far as the laws of the District were concerned; that she followed the Army to Brandy Station with her goods, and traded there with the officers and soldiers, but that while so trading, and while, as appears by the testimony of a large number of officers of that corps, her conduct was good and she was especially active in kindness and care of sick and wounded Union soldiers, the provost marshal seized the property mentioned in her memorial, and it was never restored to her, and so far as appears was used by the Army, it being mostly such supplies as the Army need.

Your committee think from all the proofs that the petitioner should be paid the fair value of the property taken, together with $200 paid by her as internal-revenue tax on this property, &c., after it was seized.

The committee recommend that petitioner be paid $5,000 in full of all claims, and that a bill be favorably reported therefor.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

EDWIN MORGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2019) for the relief of Edwin Morgan, late captain of Company G, Seventy-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was read. As proposed to be amended by the Committee on Military Affairs, it directs the Secretary of the Treasury, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Edwin Morgan, late captain of Company G, Seventy-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry in command of company, from the 19th day of June, 1864, to the 1st day of May, 1865, together with three months' pay proper allowed to certain officers of the volunteer service under section 4 of act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, after deducting from the amount of his pay and allowances any sums of money heretofore paid Morgan for his services for the time aforesaid.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the claim of Edwin Morgan, having investigated the same, would respectfully report thereon as follows:

That in 1863 he entered the service as first sergeant Company G, Seventy-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; that on June 25, 1863, W. H. Thomas, first lieutenant of same company, was killed at Liberty Gap, Tennessee; the captain resigned in September, 1863, and in the same month David Garbet, second lieutenant of same company, was taken prisoner and remained in the hands of the enemy until March, 1865, when he was exchanged or paroled, and about May 1, 1865, was mustered out of service. On June 19, 1864, the ordnance stores were turned over to him as lieutenant commanding company. June 27, 1864, he was commissioned second lieutenant Company G, Seventy-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, by Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, but could not be mustered, as the second lieutenant (who had been commissioned first lieutenant) was a prisoner and there was no vacancy in that position. He refused the position of first lieutenant over his brother officer while he was a prisoner, although commissioned by the governor January 24, 1865. On this commission he was mustered in May 1, 1865, after the second lieutenant, Garbet, had been released and mustered out. He having commanded the company from the 19th of June, 1864, until May 1, 1865, receiving only the pay of sergeant, it is but just that he should receive the pay. He was honorably mustered out of the service in Texas, December 6, 1865. The committee recommend the passage of the bill for his relief.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

LANDS IN BROTHERTOWN RESERVATION, WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2096) to authorize the issue of a patent of certain lands in the Brothertown reservation in the State of Wisconsin to the persons selected by the Brothertown Indians.

The bill was read.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, is this a private bill?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair it is a private bill. It is for the relief of a single corporation.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a case arising under a treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. What point does the gentleman make?

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that this is not a private bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair the objection comes too late.

Mr. RANDALL. Too late? I could not know the character of the bill until I heard it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should have raised this point when the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no; I make the point of order that it is improperly on the Private Calendar. The referring of the bill has nothing to do with the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Not now; I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no means of making the point that the bill is improperly on the Private Calendar until I find it there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can object to the consideration of the bill if he desires.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I want the Chair to decide on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided it.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it is a most extraordinary decision. I object to the bill.

GEORGE M'COLLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2242) granting a pension to George McColly.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of George McColly, private in Company E, First Minnesota Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

KATE LOUISE ROY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3277) granting a pension to Kate Louise Roy.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Kate Louise Roy, widow of James P. Roy, late lieutenant-colonel Fifteenth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay her a pension for the rank held at the date of his death, in lieu of the pension now received.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN FECHTEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3278) granting a pension to Ellen Fechtel.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ellen Fechtel, widow of John G. Fechtel, late a wagoner in Company F, Seventeenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence in the case that John G. Fechtel was mustered into the service as a wagoner in Company F, Seventeenth Regiment Missouri Volunteers, September 26, 1861, and was discharged from service March 21, 1862, by reason of pulmonary consumption, contracted in the service.

Hugh Gollmer, captain of company, swears that the soldier, about February, 1862, while in the line of his duty, became disabled by the prostration of his whole system—want of breath, blood rushing to the head, and that he was a sound man at enlistment.

Charles Zimmer, first lieutenant of company, swears that the soldier while in the line of duty, while in pursuit of General Price's army in March, 1862, was run over by his wagon, injuring his breast; was brought to hospital and never recovered, having become permanently disabled from disease of the lungs.

Dr. Joseph Stadler swears that the soldier was sound and free from disease at enlistment; that in 1865 he came under his care, suffering with disease of the lungs, occasioned by an injury to the breast. He was under his treatment at various times from that date, and in his opinion the disease from which he died was the result of consumption.

August Wilkin, John Orth, John Eckel, and Karl Parl, swear that soldier was sound and free from disease when he enlisted; that when he came home from the Army he was afflicted with injuries of his breast and head, and on account of said injuries he could not perform manual labor; he remained in this condition until he died, November 22, 1869.

The claim was denied by the Pension Office on the grounds that the disease of which he died, "dropsy," was not the result of his military service.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN C. WEBSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3279) granting a pension to Benjamin C. Webster.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Benjamin C. Webster, late a private in Company F, Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence in the case that he was drafted September 20, 1864, and assigned to Company F, Eighth Regiment Maine Volunteers, and discharged from service June 11, 1865.

His claim was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the disease for which he claims a pension existed prior to his entering the service.

Claimant alleges in his claim for pension that, when he was examined as a drafted man, he claimed exemption on account of his disability, but the examining surgeon insisted that he was a sound man within the meaning of the law, refused to exempt him, and compelled him to go into the service.

Dr. L. B. Pillsbury swears that he was well acquainted with claimant prior to his enlistment and attended him professionally, and at the time he was drafted he was weak and feeble and claimed exemption, but the examining surgeon, in spite of his protestations and those of his friends, pronounced him a sound and well man, and compelled him to go into the service as a soldier. Deponent saw him immediately after his discharge; he was then lame and crippled and permanently disabled, and has continued so ever since.

The surgeon of his regiment states that in April, 1865, during the whole campaign, he performed his duties faithfully but with difficulty, as he was often unable to keep up during the march on account of sickness.

Your committee believe this to be a meritorious case, and report the accompanying bill, and recommend the passage of the same.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3280) granting a pension to James Johnson.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Johnson, late sergeant in Company C, Fifteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers, if found disabled by reason of disease of the eyes and chills and fever.

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence in the case that James Johnson enlisted as a private in Company C, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Volunteers, December 9, 1861; was promoted sergeant, re-enlisted as a veteran, and was honorably mustered out of service July 5, 1866.

Whitman L. Orcutt, late first lieutenant of company, swears that soldier was a sound and healthy man at enlistment; never knew him to be sick until in the summer of 1862, when he was sun-struck, and in the next spring was afflicted with sore eyes and chills and fever and that said diseases were contracted in the service.

Charles H. Shaw swears that he was a comrade of soldier, and in 1861 he was a sound, healthy man; in the summer of 1862 he was sun-struck, and about the spring of 1863, while in Florida, he suffered with chills and fever; also suffered with the same disease and disease of the eyes during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866, and up to the time of his discharge from the service, and that these diseases were contracted in the service.

Robert Anderson swears that he knew soldier prior to his enlistment, and knows that he was a sound, healthy man; knows that during the years 1870, 1871, and 1872 he was suffering from chills and fever and sore eyes, and for a greater part of the time he was unable to work by reason of said diseases.

The late commanding officer of his regiment states that while in the service soldier suffered from chills and fever and other malarial diseases. He was an excellent soldier, always doing his duty promptly and faithfully when his health permitted. He is now disabled by the loss of his right leg above the knee, and he is informed that but for the impaired condition of his general health his leg might have been saved. This accident occurred since his discharge.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH A. WOOD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3281) granting a pension to Hannah A. Wood.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hannah A. Wood, widow of Samuel A. Wood, late second lieutenant in Company M, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence in the case that Samuel Wood was mustered into the service as a second lieutenant, Company M, First Regiment New Jersey Cavalry Volunteers, December 12, 1864, and mustered out as such July 24, 1865.

George A. Bourne, late captain of company, swears that soldier was injured by his horse falling on him, in the line of duty, injuring his left side; that he also contracted chronic diarrhea from exposure.

Dr. William W. Whitney swears that he attended soldier about June 24, 1865, while he was on a leave of absence; treated him for chronic diarrhea and for an injury to his left side; soldier continued under his treatment until September 15, 1865; that his death occurred July 25, 1866, and he verily believes it to have resulted from said disease and injury.

M. G. Carey swears that he was assistant superintendent of Missouri Pacific Railroad, and that soldier was yard-master of depot from October, 1865, till his death, July 26, 1866; that he was troubled during the whole time with diarrhea and an injury to his left side; did not employ any physician, but used prescriptions given him by Dr. Whitney; was taken to hospital about four o'clock p. m., and died same night; the physicians in attendance cannot give any information.

Hannah M. Whitney and William O. Cornish swear that they saw soldier immediately after his discharge from the service; he was in feeble health, suffering from chronic diarrhea and injury to his left side.

The claim was denied by the Pension Office on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to show cause of death incident to the service.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH M'COOEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3282) granting a pension to Sarah McCooey.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pensions laws, the name of Sarah McCooey, mother of John McCooey, late private in Company F, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry.

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence in the case that John McCooey was pensioned September 18, 1863, for a gunshot-wound fracturing the jaw, right side, the ball passing through the neck and coming out near the spine. He died February 11, 1873, of pulmonary consumption. It is also shown by the evidence in the case that the soldier recognized his obligations to support his mother by transmitting to her, while in the service, the sum of $25 at one period and $16 at another; that her husband is living; is seventy-six years of age; is now, and has been, afflicted with rheumatism, and is unable to render her any support.

A. B. Olin swears that he has been acquainted with claimant since 1860, and never knew of her having any property, either real or personal.

B. Mackall swears that he has been acquainted with claimant since 1866, during which time she has not owned any property, and is now entirely destitute.

Doctors Richings and Riley swear that the husband of claimant has been under their treatment from November, 1872, for rheumatism, and not able to perform any manual labor.

Petitioner alleges that the physician who attended her son in his last illness, and who was an entire stranger to her, was unable to testify to the facts necessary to a favorable consideration by the Pension Office; said physician did not know that her son had served in the Army, consequently could not supply the necessary proofs.

Your committee believe this to be a meritorious case, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA SCROGGIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 641) granting a pension to Julia Scroggin.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia Scroggin, widow of Humphrey Scroggin, late private in Captain L. Worthy's company of Georgia militia in the war of 1812.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN PIERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 121) granting a pension to John Pierson.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Pierson, late captain of Company H, Tenth Regiment of Michigan Infantry, to take effect from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

URIAL BUNDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 43) granting a pension to Urial Bundy.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Urial Bundy, late a private in Company F of the Seventh Vermont Regiment, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABRAHAM ELLIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 545) granting a pension to Abraham Ellis.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Abraham Ellis, with the rank of first lieutenant, to take effect from the passage of the act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. EDEN. I move the committee rise.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 52.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no quorum present. We have passed enough bills to occupy what will be a reasonable time in the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. We can run a while longer, as the reports of committees do not have to be read in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not require a quorum to rise, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania has called attention to the fact that a quorum is not present.

Mr. HOSKINS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EDEN and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 93.

So the committee refused to rise.

DAVID W. STOCKSTILL, OF SIDNEY, OHIO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1183) for the relief of David W. Stockstill, of Sidney, Ohio.

The preamble recites that on the 27th day of September, 1864, one Henry I. Stockstill, of Shelby County, Ohio, was drafted into the service of the United States; on the 19th day of December, 1864, one David W. Stockstill, a brother of said Henry I. Stockstill, of the same county and State, procured a substitute, named Frank Schooley, to serve in place of said Henry I. Stockstill, to whom he paid the sum of $700; the said substitute, Frank Schooley, was mustered into the service of the United States, and honorably served the Government until discharged; and the said Henry I. Stockstill was not discharged by reason of having furnished said substitute, but was required to serve out his time for which he was drafted.

The bill then authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to David W. Stockstill, of Sidney, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $700.

The report was read, as follows:

That on the 27th day of September, 1864, Henry I. Stockstill, of Shelby County, Ohio, was drafted into the service of the United States and assigned to duty in Company D, Fifty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers. On the 19th day of December, 1864, David W. Stockstill, brother of said Henry I. Stockstill, of the same county and State, paid $700 for Frank Schooly, as a substitute, who was also mustered into service in Company E, Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and who served during the war. The fact that this substitute was procured was reported to Colonel Wood, commanding said regiment, who refused to discharge said Henry I. Stockstill—the orders of General Thomas forbidding any such release. Both soldiers served during the war, and David W. Stockstill asks that the $700 paid for the substitute be refunded to him. This seems but reasonable and just, and your committee would make a favorable report in the case. The committee would add that the Military Committee, Forty-third Congress, investigated this case, made a favorable report, and recommended the passage of a bill affording the relief asked, which was reported back to the House, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, but was not reached for want of time. Your committee would therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

D. P. ROWE AND BROWN & CROWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1219) for the relief of D. P. Rowe and Brown & Crowell, of Morristown, Tennessee.

The bill, which was read, provides that D. P. Rowe and Brown & Crowell, of Morristown, Tennessee, be, and are thereby, released from payment of the tax penalty or license for making ten stills or apparatus for distilling, the same having been made in ignorance of the purpose for which said apparatus was intended, and under the belief that the same was intended for an entirely different purpose, and without any intent to defraud the Government or violate any law, as fully appears from the petition and testimony in the case; and if the tax penalty or license has been paid by them, the same shall be refunded to them, and paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on proof being made of the amount so paid.

The report was read, as follows:

It appears that a man named Fry applied to Rowe and others, who were tinners, to make for him a tin apparatus, a model of which he brought with him; that Fry informed him that it was not for any illegal use; that it was not a still, and that Rowe and his partners were in no danger of the violation of law from making the apparatus; that Rowe made ten of these, at $2.25 apiece, making, in the aggregate, $22.50; and that these were all he made, and this was done in utter ignorance of any illegal use proposed by said Fry.

The license tax of $50 was assessed against the makers of the apparatus, and $20 apiece for them and $20 penalty, in all $270, which it seems has been paid, though this does not clearly appear.

The assistant district attorney, who prosecuted the case, has filed a statement which, while insisting that the party was technically guilty, shows that he thinks the case one of hardship, and one in which "there was no design on his part to evade the law," as was apparent to the assistant attorney at the time.

The testimony to the excellent character and law-abiding habits of D. P. Rowe is ample, and his veracity and integrity are fully sustained.

It further appears that as D. P. Rowe made this apparatus without the knowledge of his partners, who furnished the capital, Rowe only doing the manual work for a share in the profits, the burden of these taxes and penalty would fall upon him. He is a young man, without means, working for his living, and yet honest and truthful. The burden imposed upon him is heavy, and for a technical, but unintentional, violation of law.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill referred to it, and herewith report it back without amendment.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF BRIGADIER-GENERAL WILLIAM THOMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1638) for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier-General William Thompson of the revolutionary army, reported with an amendment.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Court of Claims to adjudicate and determine the amount due William Thompson, a brigadier-general in the Army of the Revolution, or his widow, children, or his legal representatives, under and by virtue of the joint resolutions of Congress of May 15, 1778, August 24, 1780, and June 3, 1784; and said claim shall be adjudged upon its merits without regard to any statute of limitations, and provided that the evidence heretofore used in said claim may be used without retaking the same, together with such other evidence as each party may introduce. And the said court is hereby directed to enter judgment for said amount, if any, in favor of Fannie A. Thompson, administratrix de bonis non of the estate of General William Thompson.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was as follows:

Add at the end of the bill the following:

Provided, That no interest shall, in any event, be allowed on said claim.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

That William Thompson was a brigadier-general in the continental service in the war of the Revolution.

By a resolution of Congress, adopted on the 15th of May, 1778, it was provided "that all officers commissioned by Congress, who now are, or who may hereafter be, in the service of the United States, and shall continue therein during the war, shall, after the conclusion of the war, receive annually, for seven years, if they live so long, one-half the present pay of such officers."

By a resolution adopted August 24, 1780, it was declared "that the resolution of the 15th day of May, 1778, granting half-pay for seven years to the officers of the Army who should continue in the service to the end of the war, be extended to the widows of those officers who have died, or who shall hereafter die, in its service, to commence from the time of such officers' death and continue for the term of seven years; or if there be no widow, or in the case of her death or intermarriage, the said half-pay be given to the orphan children of the officer dying as aforesaid, if he shall have left any, and that it recommend to the Legislatures of the respective States to which such officers belong to make provisions for paying the same on account of the United States."

This claim is based upon these resolutions of Congress, and was first brought by Robert C. Thompson, administrator and a grandchild of General William Thompson, in 1854, and a bill was introduced into the Senate allowing the claim. The bill was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported upon favorably by the committee, and passed the Senate. In the House it was referred to the Court of Claims for a report. From the report of the Court of Claims and the evidence, it fully appears that William Thompson was a brigadier-general in the revolutionary war, and that he died in service (or a prisoner on parol) in 1780, and that he left a wife and children, who have since died, leaving children.

The court say that there was no evidence before them that Catharine Thompson was the widow of General Thompson, nor did it appear before the court that she lived unmarried seven years after his death, or for any specified period after that event, or that she died or married again before the expiration of the seven years.

There is evidence, which was not before the Court of Claims, which shows that Catharine Thompson was the widow of General Thompson, and that she remained and died his widow in 1809, but the court say that "independently of any defects in the evidence, the claim is barred by the statute of limitations," and that the claimants have no cause of action. Notwithstanding this report of the Court of Claims, the House Committee on Revolutionary Claims reported a bill on the 29th May, 1858, in favor of the payment of the seven years' half-pay. This bill was not acted upon, and no action was taken by the next Congress.

Robert Thompson died, and the claim was revived before the Forty-first Congress by the petition of Fannie Thompson, a great-grandchild and administratrix de bonis non. On the 3d June, 1870, the Senate Committee on Revolutionary Claims made a report, accompanied by a bill, granting the seven years' half-pay, and recommending its passage. This was not acted upon.

Application was again made to the Forty-second Congress, and on the 30th of May, 1872, the Senate Committee on Revolutionary Claims reported again in favor of the claim, accompanying the report by a bill granting seven years' half-pay. This was not acted upon.

There is no explanation of the long delay in the presentation of this claim, and the present bill only asks that the Court of Claims be authorized and directed to adjudicate the claim upon its merits, without regard to the statute of limitations, authorizing the court to use the evidence heretofore taken.

The application to be allowed to be heard before the Court of Claims upon the merits seems to the committee reasonable, and they recommend the passage of the bill, with a proviso that in no event shall more than the principal that may be found due upon such claim be allowed, and the bill is reported back so amended, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The amendment was adopted.

There being no objection the bill as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAYLER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report favorably sundry bills, some with and some without amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the titles of the bills in their order, and if no objection be made, they will be considered as passed by the House.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Private Calendar and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 2691) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department. The bill includes a number of claims that ought to be paid, and it is desirable that it be passed immediately that it may go to the Senate.

Mr. LAWRENCE. These are the claims allowed under the act of 1864?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. They are the claims reported by the Treasury Department?

Mr. BRIGHT. Yes, sir, by the Treasury Department; approved by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury and the Third Auditor.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky. And by a committee of this House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. All right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill now?

There was no objection, and the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was brought before the House for consideration.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named the several sums mentioned herein; the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers under the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, since December 7, 1874, namely.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to call up the unfinished business of Friday last.

Mr. WADDELL. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman.

PATRICK J. CONDON.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3586) for the relief of Patrick J. Condon, late captain Company G, Sixty-third Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, granting back pension; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MEDICAL INSPECTOR WILLIAM M. KING, UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. WADDELL also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3587) for the relief of Medical Inspector William M. King, United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. I believe that is a privileged motion. My object is to have a number of bills on the Speaker's table referred or otherwise disposed of.

Mr. HUNTON. I have not yielded the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business of last Friday.

RETIREMENT OF JUDGE M'CANDLESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I call up House bill (H. R. No. 219) to permit the judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania to retire, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendments of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 strike out the words "the honorable," so that it will read, "made applicable to Wilson McCandless."

At the end of the bill insert, "provided the said McCandless shall resign his office within six months next after the passage of this act."

The question was on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and being taken, there were—ayes 77, noes 28; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. HUNTON and Mr. MILLIKEN.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 102, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOPKINS. I hope the House will not adjourn. If that motion is pressed, I will insist on calling the yeas and nays on it.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 49, noes 113.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 16 members voting therefor.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand that a quorum voted upon the question of adjournment, and now we want the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, if a further count is insisted on. [Cries of "Further count."]

Mr. HOPKINS. Then I insist upon the call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being on a division—ayes 25, noes 93; one-fifth voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not this a House bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a House bill with amendments of the Senate, and the vote on concurring in the Senate amendments if carried passes the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 59, noes 105.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MOREY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the calling of the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 83, not voting 120; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, was granted leave of absence for one week from May 29 on account of important business.

REFORM IN THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2935) to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to provide for its gradual reduction, and to consolidate certain of its staff departments, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. Pending that I would like the gentleman to allow me to move that the House do now adjourn.

W. P. BURWELL.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make some reports from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BANNING. If it will not lead to debate.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Claims a bill (H. R. No. 3588) for the relief of W. P. Burwell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 114) for the relief of Orloff Johnson; and

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 27, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the time will be extended for morning business, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator yield to allow me to present a petition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield for petitions, but beyond petitions I think bills and resolutions can wait until we discharge the other business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN. I am requested by citizens of this District to present a memorial, quite numerously signed, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 2604) to incorporate the Suburban Railroad Company of the District of Columbia. The bill authorizes this company to build its road and run it by steam through C street and Maryland avenue to the Bladensburgh turnpike on the District line. They set forth in the memorial that this being a thoroughfare, it would greatly injure the property upon it to allow it to be traversed by cars propelled by steam. There is a cemetery upon the line which is very much frequented; and the memorialists remonstrate against the passage of any such bill. I suppose the bill is pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I move that the memorial be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions, pursuant to order, legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next at ten o'clock a. m.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PATTERSON a member of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to visit the Military Academy at West Point, in place of Mr. CLAYTON, resigned.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, (at six o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 27, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PUBLIC PROPERTY AT NORFOLK, VIRGINIA.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, by unanimous consent, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1869) providing for the repair and preservation of the public property at Norfolk, Virginia; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I understand that it is the wish of the Committee on Military Affairs to press the consideration of the bill to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States, &c. I also understand that it is the wish of the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain the result of the action of the House upon that bill in order to control their action upon the Army appropriation bill. I will therefore refrain from calling up now the regular order, which is the contested-election case of Spencer vs. Morey, but will yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BANNING.]

Mr. BANNING. Before I call up the Army bill, I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LORD,] who desires to make some reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEES OF CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. LORD. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a substitute for House bill No. 136, to amend section 840, chapter 16, title 13, of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The effect of the bill is to reduce the fees of the clerks of the circuit and district court of California by one-half. They are now entitled to receive double the fees allowed to clerks of the courts in other States, except Oregon and Nevada.

The bill amends section 840 of chapter 16, title 13, of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "California."

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3589) was received, read three times, and passed.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALABAMA CLAIMS—GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back House bill No. 3116, providing for the payment of judgments of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims. The court has passed upon all the claims under chapter 499 of the acts of the last session of Congress. Most of the claims have already been paid. This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the balance of these judgments to the persons to whom they have been awarded and who are really suffering for the amount due them. It makes no difference to the United States, for the amounts are due and the money is in the Treasury. This is a meritorious bill; the court of commissioners has awarded the amounts to these parties, and they are really suffering for the money. I ask that the bill be now passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the court of commissioners of Alabama claims shall report to the Secretary of State the judgments rendered by said court from and after January 22, 1876, from the entire calendar of cases before it, under the original act constituting said court, pursuant to section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress.

SEC. 2. That when a report is made under this act to the Secretary of State, he shall transmit the same or a copy thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, without unnecessary delay, proceed, pursuant to said chapter 459, to pay the judgments so rendered, with interest on the principal at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum from the date of loss, as certified, until the Secretary of the Treasury shall give notice for payment, as provided by section 14 of such act; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to convert into coupon bonds, and to sell, after five days' notice, so many as may be necessary for this purpose of the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States, now held subject to the disposition of Congress under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1873, chapter 261.

SEC. 3. That so much of section 15 of the act approved June 23, 1874, chapter 459, as conflicts with this act is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House, No. 1594, entitled "An act making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

O. R. SINGLETON,
SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
HENRY WALDRON,
Managers on the part of the House.
A. A. SARGENT,
F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was adopted.

REPORT OF CASUALTIES IN THE NAVY.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 3536) to authorize and require the Congressional Printer to print and bind five thousand copies of the surgical report of casualties in the United States Navy from 1860 to 1870, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2552) to reduce the expenditures for public advertising in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. It provides that so much of section 3826 of the Revised Statutes as provides that all advertisements, notices, and proposals for contracts for all the Executive Departments of the Government, and the laws passed by Congress and executive proclamations and treaties, shall be advertised by publication in three daily papers published in the District of Columbia, be amended to limit such publication hereafter to two daily newspapers published in said District, one of which shall be selected by the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate and one by the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SINGLETON. The whole object of this bill is to require these advertisements to be published in two newspapers instead of three. We do not see any necessity for the publication in three newspapers of this District.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL DIRECTORY OF STATE GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relating to a consolidated official directory of the several State governments, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WALKER'S STATISTICAL ATLAS.

Mr. SINGLETON also, from the same committee, reported back adversely a resolution for printing five thousand additional copies of Walker's Statistical Atlas, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF NAME OF A SCHOONER.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 3590) to change the name of the scow-schooner J. L. Quimby to Perry G. Walker; which was read the first and second time.

The bill provides that the name of the scow-schooner J. L. Quimby, registered in the district of Sandusky, Ohio, be changed to Perry G. Walker, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to grant a register in accordance therewith.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2935) to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to provide for its gradual reduction, and to consolidate certain of its staff departments, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill is now before the House, on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BANNING. The bill now under consideration is the conclusion of the committee after a careful study of our Army organization.

The staff, commissioned and non-commissioned; the officers, active and retired; the cavalry, artillery, and infantry; the Engineer Corps; the Signal Corps and Indian scouts; the Inspector-General's Department; the Adjutant-General's; the Bureau of Military Justice; the Quartermaster's Department; the Subsistence Department; the Medical Department; the Pay and Ordnance Departments.

I know, Mr. Speaker, there are members of this House who believe the numerical strength of our Army too small and others who believe it too large.

Charged with the important consideration of our military affairs, the Military Committee have consulted the general officers, the colonels, and certain other distinguished officers of the Army, receiving from them opinions concerning our military organization, which have been printed and are now before the House in Report No. 354.

The maximum numerical strength of our Army is fixed by law at 25,000 men. These 25,000 men are organized into 25 regiments of infantry, 10 regiments of cavalry, 5 regiments of artillery, and Indian scouts. These organizations are divided into commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, farriers, blacksmiths, artificers, saddlers, wagoners, company clerks, and private soldiers. Sixteen thousand six hundred and sixty-five are private soldiers and 8,345 non-commissioned officers, wagoners, artificers, and musicians. Add to these last 2,168 commissioned officers on the active list and 300 officers on the retired list, making in all 10,802, and we have our Army organization of 16,665 private soldiers commanded, marshaled, and managed by 10,803 commissioned and non-commissioned officers, artificers, musicians, and wagoners; being a commander for each 1¼ soldiers in the service; showing that our Army is an army of officers, an army for display, and not a practical, useful, efficient military force, such as the country requires.

In correcting this evil and re-organizing the Army the first question for the careful and considerate legislator to determine is: Is the present force of 25,000 men more of an army than the country demands?

Before I studied this question I thought an army of 20,000 more than sufficient. I voted in last Congress for the reduction from thirty to twenty-five thousand men, and advocated a greater reduction at that time.

That this Government, separated as it is by an ocean from all the powerful nations of the earth, needs a standing army to protect it from a foreign invasion no intelligent man will claim. Our people, raised in the saddle and accustomed to the use of fire-arms, would gather to the country's defense long before an invading army could be shipped to our shores.

The question of a greater reduction of the Army and the policy of a small regular army are so well and ably presented by General Thomas M. Vincent, in his letter to the committee, that I read at length that distinguished officer's opinion, found on page 135 of our report. General Vincent says:

The staff and line—our peace establishment—are maintained for the acquirement and preservation of military knowledge and to perfect military discipline, to construct defenses and organize the material necessary in war, and generally to form the stock, in all its parts, on which an army competent to the defense of the country may be ingrafted.

Past experience has pointed to the following facts: The saving in clothing, provisions, arms, and other things, by not being compelled to call out militia or volunteers, would amply supply a considerable force which, well officered, would be daily improving. The expenses of militia and volunteers invariably exceed those of the regulars by several hundred per cent. The Black Hawk and Florida wars necessitated 55,000 militia and an expenditure of $30,000,000, and would have been avoided in each case had there been two regiments of regulars available for early service. A well organized available force of 12,000 would have enabled the Government to avoid the Mexican war and its consequent expenditure of millions of dollars and a large sacrifice of human life; and the recent rebellion would have been staid by an available force of a few thousand men, and the country spared a debt of $2,718,656,176.13, (public debt July 1, 1866, $2,783,425,879.21; debt July 1, 1860, $64,769,703.08,) incident to and arising from the war, and this independently of a pension-list for 1874–'75, which calls for $28,845,678.27, (amount for 1874–'75, $30,000,000; for 1860, $1 154,321.73,) and for the years from 1861 to 1875, inclusive—exclusive of pension debt prior to 1861—as follows:

1861	$1,089,218 75
1862	800,819 94
1863	1,044,364 47
1864	4,521,622 18
1865	8,542,885 27
1866	13,250,980 17
1867	18,681,711 79
1868	24,079,403 18
1869	28,445,089 09
1870	27,780,811 81
1871	33,077,383 63
1872	30,169,241 00
1873	29,185,289 62
1874	30,593,749 56
1875	29,683,116 63
Total	280,945,787 09
For 1860	1,154,321 73

leaving $279,791,465.36 as the pension debt of the rebellion.

The magnitude attained by the rebellion is the most instructive, for the public debt and money paid to pensioners ($2,718,656,176.13+$279,791,465.36) would maintain our present force, costing, say, $30,000,000 yearly, for ninety-nine and two-thirds years. Now, however, and as a result of a temporary economy, we have to pay the debt, expend nearly $30,000,000 yearly for pensions, and support a military establishment costing $30,000,000; consequently we have lost, by not having an available force to prevent rebellion, the enormous amount of $2,998,447,641.49.

Our Army of 25,000 men, taking into consideration the duties now required, is relatively smaller than the Army of 1860 of 14,000 men. In 1860 there were 72 military posts and 176 companies (say 17½ regiments) west of the Mississippi River, with only 8 posts and 29 companies (say 3 regiments) north of the thirty-ninth parallel of latitude and east of the Rocky Mountains, embracing the area out of which the Territories of Montana, Dakota, and Wyoming have since been formed, with parts of Nebraska and Minnesota. At present there are 112 posts and 324 companies (say 32½ regiments) west of the Mississippi River, of which 39 posts and 137 companies (say 14 regiments) are within the limits above described, being 31 posts and 108 companies (say 11 regiments) more than in 1860. In this locality the greatest increase has occurred. Along the Rio Grande and the interior of Texas, the Indian Territory, Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah, Nevada, and the Pacific coast there has been no material change in the number of posts.

In Arizona there are now 9 posts and 24 companies (say 2½ regiments) against 3 posts and 7 companies (say ½ of a regiment) in 1860.

Alaska has two posts and three companies and Idaho three posts and four companies against none in 1860.

The length of the principal railroads built beyond the Mississippi River since 1861 is as follows:

Northern Pacific, running from Du Luth, Minnesota, to Bismarck, Dakota, 450 miles.

Union Pacific and Central Pacific, running from Omaha, Nebraska, to San Francisco, California, 1,907 miles.

Kansas Pacific, running from Kansas City, Missouri, to Denver, Colorado, 639 miles.

Denver Pacific, running from Denver, Colorado, to Cheyenne, Wyoming, 106 miles.

Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé, running from Atchison, Kansas, to West Las Animas, Colorado, 536 miles.

Missouri, Kansas and Texas, running from Hannibal, Missouri, to Galveston, Texas, 964 miles.

Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf, running from Kansas City, Missouri, to Baxter Springs, Kansas, 159 miles.

Making 4,761 miles of railroad built in and through the Indian country since 1860 for the Army to protect against the Indians.

Since 1860, Colorado with 104,500 square miles of territory, Nevada with 104,155 square miles of territory, Dakota with 150,932 square miles of territory, Arizona with 113,916 square miles of territory, Idaho with 86,294 square miles of territory, Montana with 143,776 square miles of territory, Wyoming with 97,883 square miles of territory, making a total of 801,426 square miles of territory, an empire in extent, organized into seven distinct territorial governments.

Into this great wilderness, where, until within the last few years, white men had never penetrated, we have invited the emigrant to settle, and to-day hundreds and thousands of pioneers are changing into productive usefulness this desert land. In this occupation we have promised them protection.

Again, we have the unorganized Indian Territory, of 68,991 square miles, and the new Territory of Alaska, consisting of 577,390 square miles, making 1,447,807 square miles of organized and unorganized territory, over which roam 289,000 Indians: through which run the railroads I have named, laden with all the valuable commerce daily carried between the Atlantic and Pacific.

Add to this the fact that the Texas frontier is not only threatened, but has been of late frequently invaded by Mexican outlaws, who have not only robbed our people of millions of property but actually killed and murdered them.

That our soldiers, while on duty along the southern border, have been fired upon within the last thirty days by maraunding bands of Mexicans, the people of the Texas border asking for protection, and a resolution pending in this House authorizing the Army to follow the Mexican outlaws over and into Mexico.

Taking into consideration all these circumstances, your committee have not deemed it wise or prudent to reduce the numerical strength of the Army at this time.

REDUCTION OF THE NUMBER OF REGIMENTS.

There are now in the Army ten cavalry regiments and twenty-five infantry regiments. The Tenth Cavalry, having less than 700 men, non-commissioned officers and privates, and the Twenty-first Infantry only 323 non-commissioned officers and privates.

All regiments are fully officered, commissioned and non-commissioned.

While I will not stop to draw a picture of the gallant Twenty-first on parade with eighty corporals, fifty sergeants, a commissary-sergeant, quartermaster-sergeant, color-sergeant, hospital-steward, ten second lieutenants, ten first lieutenants, ten captains, a quartermaster, an adjutant, three surgeons, one major, one lieutenant-colonel, and one colonel—172 in all—in command of what is left, after deducting non-commissioned officers, company clerks, and extra duty men, leaving less than 100 privates. I say I will not stop to draw a picture of this gallant American regiment, whose glittering official display would drive terror and dismay to the heart of an enemy. Nor is this the only regiment that is formidable by reason of its preponderance of officers. The Twenty-fourth Infantry is even more formidable by reason of its number of officers than the Twenty-first. After deducting the non-commissioned officers, there would be left 84 private soldiers in this regiment.

Deduct from this 84 the company clerks and extra-duty men, and the Twenty-first would find it necessary to send over to another regiment to borrow a private to call the corporal of the guard that he might advise the garrison of the approach of the officer of the day.

Several others of the regiments are almost as small in numbers as the two I have mentioned, while no infantry regiment in the service, deducting non-commissioned officers and extra-duty men, numbers as many as 400 soldiers.

Upon this subject General Sheridan says:

If you increase the size of the companies you diminish the expense. One great item of expense at present arises from the fact that the companies are so small as to be non-effective. In order to get an effective body of men for any purpose, it is necessary to take three or four companies from different places. That kind of management is, of course, expensive; and that is what we are obliged to resort to at present.

Captain Corbin, one of the most accomplished and distinguished officers of our Army, gives his opinion and experience upon this subject on page 210 of the report of the Military Committee, and says:

Question. Have you any information or opinion that you can give the committee on the question of consolidation?

Answer. I do not know that I have, except that I think the efficiency of the Army would be greatly enhanced by increasing the size of the companies. I think that the trouble we labor under now with the present company organization of infantry is that it is too small. I believe the maximum is fifty men, and after you take out the non-commissioned officers and the cook, and allow for the sick and the prisoners in the guard-house and the men who are detailed to drive the teams, it leaves hardly any men in the company for duty. I do not think the company organization should consist of less than one hundred men, either in time of peace or time of war, either for active operations or for purposes of instruction. It is rather stupid work for an officer to go out and drill four men. After having been a captain for ten years, I have frequently gone out with only four men. It is very hard to make an entertainment of that kind partake of the nature of a military movement. We go on parade duty regularly, to be sure, but the men look upon it as a kind of farce. I have seen a captain go on parade with only his sergeant, the captain forming the front line and the sergeant the rear. The officer cannot take as much interest in that as if he had a hundred men to look after. I think, therefore, it would tend greatly to the efficiency of the Army if you were to increase the companies, even if he had to assign more officers. A company of one hundred men with five officers would be much more efficient than two companies of fifty men each with six officers. Then, the internal administration of a company of one hundred men requires no more sergeants or cooks or commissary-sergeants than a company of fifty men. It is, however, more trouble for an officer to take care of and drill a hundred men than fifty. So, probably, if the companies were increased in size, it would be well to increase the number of officers. I have been told by officers of our Army who have visited Europe that they were greatly impressed with the difference in the size of the companies, and General Hazen and other officers who are capable of judging, have told me that that was about the only advantage the European armies had over ours. A company there means a hundred or a hundred and fifty efficient men.

Q. Then, if consolidations and reductions must be made, you would recommend the consolidation of the companies into larger ones?

A. I would, most assuredly. I think if we are to have but 20,000 men in the Army, the larger the companies are made the more service our commanders can get out of the troops, and I think you will find that that is the testimony of most of the officers. I know if I were to go to command a post of a hundred men I would rather have one company of a hundred than two companies of fifty men each, because it would give me more men for active duty. To maintain a company organization you have to have a certain number of men who are useless as soldiers, being engaged on other duty; for instance, four of the best men in your company are taken up as sergeants, so that in two companies of fifty men each there are eight sergeants, and in a company of a hundred there would be just the same number; and the same is true of the musicians, cooks, company clerks, and commissary sergeants. Then, the property of a large company is just as easily looked after as that of a small one, and one man can do the work as efficiently as two.

This evil is remedied by the first section of the bill, which provides for a reduction of the infantry regiments to twenty and the cavalry regiments to eight.

This will make a reduction of 177 infantry officers and 88 cavalry officers, 60 non-commissioned staff officers, and 1,010 non-commissioned officers.

This reduction will result in an ultimate saving of $569,536 and a much better and more efficient Army organization.

COLORED TROOPS.

Section 1104 of the Revised Statutes reads:

The enlisted men of two regiments of cavalry shall be colored men.

And section 1108 reads:

The enlisted men of two regiments of infantry shall be colored men.

This law as it stands is an insult to the race it was meant to compliment. If the negro is on an equality with his white brother as to military duty, why this limit to four regiments? But to leave no doubt upon this point it is provided that the enlisted men of four regiments may be made up from the colored race. There is no proviso for colored commissioned officers. As the law now stands under the Constitution there is no prohibition to the enlistment of a negro save the enactment we now seek to repeal. This alone is sufficient to demand the repeal. But in addition comes the fact that the experiment has proven a disastrous failure. Colored men will no longer enlist, so that it is found impossible to keep up the regiments; while those who do enter the Army are of such a class that they cannot be trusted or made of any benefit to themselves or the country. I need not dwell upon this point, as the facts admitted appeal to the better reason of all sides. Having broken down the barriers erected through slavery between the races, it is not only unjust, but unreasonable, to recognize such distinction by law. It is just as absurd to give a colored man a privilege because he is a colored man as it was unjust to degrade him for the same reason.

On this subject I wish to call attention to the report of Inspector-General N. H. Davis; also the report of Chaplain George T. Mullins, of the Twenty-fifth United States Infantry:

[Extracts from certain inspection reports made by Inspector-General N. H. Davis during his recent tour of inspection in the Department of Texas, relative to the morale of the colored troops there stationed.]

The practice of theft with the colored troops, stealing from one another their arms and clothing, which they dispose of by sale or otherwise, is an evil which seems difficult to eradicate. Usually the arms are kept locked in the arm-racks when not in use on duty. Pistols are seldom left in the hands of men in garrison; and chiefs of squads were required at some posts to keep an inventory of the clothing, &c., of the men of their squads, and report at the adjutant's office, daily or weekly, if any articles were missing, to check the evil.

I take pleasure in submitting the interesting report of Chaplain Mullins (paper marked "C") in regard to his school for the colored troops, their characteristics, progress, religious services, &c. * * *

I have no hesitation in saying that Chaplain Mullins is one of the most energetic, reasonable, and serviceable of his profession in the Army that I have met in my inspections.

[Extract from Chaplain Mullins's report.]

* * * Many of the soldiers are very religious, but (queer paradox) few indeed prove to be moral in their lives. They know not what virtue means, and some of them are vilely lecherous. So far as I can collect they do not like military life and will not re-enlist. * * *

Their life and experience through generations has evidently impressed upon or wrought into their make up a strong indisposition to a life that requires great carefulness, persistency, and quick energy. They like the "go-easy" and unambitious life, free from care and restraint. They evidently feel that in the Army they surrender their freedom so lately won. * * *

N. H. DAVIS,
Inspector-General United States Army.

[Memorandum from Adjutant-General's Office.]

The records of the War Department will attest that it is difficult to get clerks, blacksmiths, and saddlers for the colored regiments—this owing to the general ignorance of the colored men who enlist.

In April, 1867, a special authorization was given for a recruiting rendezvous at Oberlin, Ohio, with view to enlisting men who could write; but none could be obtained.

Even difficult to get recruits for the regiments notwithstanding that this branch of the service is conducted on the most liberal plan; all suggestions from officers which are at all reasonable being adopted by the Adjutant-General of the Army in order to keep the regiments from being broken up. Regiments rapidly run down through discharges, &c.

Once, in August, 1875, commanding-general Department of Texas reported that by September 1, 1875, the companies of the Twenty fourth Infantry would average twelve men, and that one company by January 1, 1876 would have its officers and one enlisted man. The same officer (General Ord) has expressed opinions adverse to mixing white and colored troops in the same garrison.

ARTILLERY.

Sections 2, 4, and 6 relate to the artillery, and provide for doing away with the regimental artillery organization. This feature, I think, will commend itself to every member, as regimental artillery officers and headquarters are certainly useless either in war or peace. A regiment of artillery, I believe, was never known to be in action on this continent, or even called out for display in time of peace. The only utility of an artillery regimental organization is in furnishing positions for a set of useless, unnecessary, and expensive officers.

EXAMINATION FOR PROMOTION.

Section 3 of the bill provides that no officer of the Army below the rank of major shall hereafter receive promotion until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination before a board of senior officers.

This is in the direction of efficiency and must commend itself sufficiently without argument. It will make it necessary for Army officers to study and improve themselves in their profession, to prepare for the great responsibility which awaits them in the event of war. It will tend to elevate and improve the profession of arms in the United States, and cause the officer to spend in the acquisition of knowledge hours now too often wasted in dissipation.

EDUCATION.

Sections 4 and 7 of the bill provide for the education of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates.

I know there are officers who say this will cause too great a familiarity between officers and men, and be injurious to discipline.

Sir, in aristocratic Germany the nobleman and the peasant are subject to the same military discipline; in that country, where the art of war is cultivated to perfection, the officer and the soldier are the guests of each other and social equals.

It was the boast of the first Napoleon that the common soldier of the French army carried in his knapsack the baton of a marshal.

"In Paris," says a writer, "you may see any day a file of soldiers marching with slates under their arms going to the regimental schools."

During our late war commanding officers all organized company and regimental schools.

In these schools, in 1861 and 1862, our army of civilians were taught and trained in the art of war. If this could be done in the field in the face of an enemy with profit and advantage, as every soldier of our Army will testify it was, need I stop to prove to this House the advantages of this section of the bill

This system of Army education will give occupation to many officers and men now being demoralized by idleness.

It will prepare the non-commissioned officer and soldier for promotion to take command in the event of war. The three thousand men who are annually mustered out by reason of expiration of term of service, in place of being unfitted for civil life, (as is now the case,) will be the better citizens, prepared to aid in the improvement and development of the country; also to elevate and improve the standard of the private soldier, to make him what he should be, the peer of the officer and every American citizen.

AIDS-DE-CAMP.

Section 8 fixes the number of aids-de-camp of the general officers, reducing the whole number from thirty to seventeen, being a reduction of thirteen and a saving in extra pay to these officers of $10,175.

BUREAU OF MILITARY JUSTICE.

Section 9 provides there shall be no new appointments and no promotions in the Bureau of Military Justice nor among the judge-advocates of the Army; also that any officer of the Bureau may be honorably discharged from the service on his own application, with one year's pay proper for each and every term of five years' service.

The testimony of Army officers is not only against the necessity but even the utility of this Bureau. General Sherman says:

Answer. This Bureau grew up out of the war. In my opinion it is better to detail an officer of the line as judge-advocate for each court-martial, as it encourages the study of martial and military law by the younger officers, usually detailed as judge-advocates. Lawyers introduced into the Army have not improved discipline or increased the measure of "substantial justice," which is the object of courts-martial, rather than the technical judgments of courts of record.

The bill, if it should become a law, provides a way for the officers of this Bureau to put an end to it by resignation. If they should fail to take advantage of the opportunity offered them, it will be for this Congress, at its next session, to take such action as will relieve the country of this unnecessary and useless establishment.

This will be an ultimate annual saving of $17,500.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLIES.

Section 10 of the bill abolishes the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments as distinct branches of the service and consolidates the two into one, to be known as a Department of Supplies.

That it is necessary in time of peace to keep up these two distinct departments is not even claimed by the most earnest advocates of the present system.

An examination into the commissary and quartermaster organizations of our Army shows that while the Quartermaster's Department, through its separate organization, purchases the clothing, camp and garrison equipage, and quartermaster's stores at New York, Philadelphia, and other commercial cities, and keeps up a Quartermaster-General's Office here in Washington at an expense to the Government of $182,320 a year, the Commissary Department, through its separate organization, purchases the commissary stores in the commercial cities of the country and keeps up a Commissary General's Office in Washington at an annual expense to the Government of $46,000.

A further examination will show in different cities of the country and departments of the Army separate expensive headquarters and management of the quartermaster and commissary stores, a further examination will show that when these supplies are issued to the troops, they are generally issued by one officer. A quartermaster, who as such becomes responsible for the honest delivery or issuing of these supplies, and for the proper returns required by the regulations for all such issues.

A further inquiry will show that this issue to the troops of broken packages requires more care and business capacity than the purchasing of supplies and the issuing the same in whole or entire packages. Then the inquiry naturally arises, if the more intricate and complicated duties of the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments can be thus performed by one officer, might not the two departments be consolidated into one to the advantage of the service and large saving of the public funds?

Without stopping to argue the propriety of this consolidation, I call the attention of the House to the evidence of the Army officers outside of the staff, (who must be ruled out as witnesses being parties in interest.) General Sherman favors it. Hancock says it is practicable. Schofield says:

It is my opinion that the duties now performed by our Quartermaster, Subsistence, and Pay Departments could be better and more economically performed under one organization.

General Howard is in favor of the consolidation. General Crook recommends it. Colonel Mackenzie says:

I believe that it would be practicable to consolidate the Quartermaster's, Subsistence, and Pay Departments, and to largely decrease the total number of officers, to improve their administration, and to lessen expenses, both in personnel, and more yet by improved administration.

Colonel Oakes says:

I think it would be practicable to consolidate the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Pay Departments into one corps. As stated under third heading, I think we have too much staff for the size of the Army, too many and too much rank to administer for the line and fighting portion of the Army. As it is now, the duties of quartermaster and commissary at the various posts are almost invariably performed by lieutenants of the line, and can continue to be so performed, and it is the exception to find an officer of either of these departments on duty at frontier posts serving with and subject to the orders of the line officer in command. In my opinion, the interests of the staff and line have become too distinct; they should be one and the same, and all under control of the General of the Army.

Colonel Sturgis says:

It is not only practicable, but advisable.

Colonel Grierson says:

The Quartermaster, Subsistence, Ordnance, and Pay Departments should be consolidated into one corps or supply department, and such consolidation would facilitate business and greatly reduce expenses.

Colonel Vogdes, of the First Artillery, says:

"Would it not be practicable to consolidate the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Pay Departments into one corps?" Yes; I think all the administrative departments should be united under one head, with the rank of brigadier-general.

General Hazen says:

Quartermaster, Subsistence, and Pay Departments could be consolidated in a corps of one-third the present number of officers, and a sufficient detail of lieutenants from the cavalry and infantry.

Colonel Kautz, of the Eighth Infantry, says:

I believe it would add to the efficiency of the military service if the Pay, Quartermaster, and Subsistence Departments were all united into one corps for supplying the Army, but I have already given the opinion that there is a doubt whether such consolidation would cause any saving in the number of officers.

Colonel Wood, of the Eleventh Infantry, says:

It would not only be practicable to consolidate the Quartermaster's, Subsistence, and Pay Departments, but, in my opinion, the Government would be better served by so doing. At almost every military post the duties of quartermaster and commissary of subsistence are now both performed by an officer of the line, detailed for that purpose. In addition to these duties the troops could just as well be paid by him, as he is now a disburser of public funds.

Colonel De Trobriand, of the Thirteenth Infantry, says:

Such a measure may have some objections to contend with and some partial difficulties to overcome, but I consider it altogether as not only practicable, but also desirable for the Army.

Colonel Potter, of the Twenty-fourth Infantry, says:

I am of the opinion that the Pay, Commissary, and Quartermaster's Departments should be consolidated into one corps; that it is practicable, and that it would be for the best interests of the service.

Major-General McDowell, one of the ablest and most accomplished officers of our Army, a man who takes great pride in his profession, whose study is the soldier's welfare and the good of the service, has given attention to this subject, and after an examination of the working of the consolidated system in the English army, recommends the consolidation of our Quartermaster's and Commissary Departments in the following forcible and conclusive manner:

This subject was taken up by the Military Committee in January, 1869, and on the 27th and 28th of that month I was fully examined by it, and beg to refer the present committee to the record for the statements I then made, which are too extended to be conveniently reproduced in this letter. The subject, since that time, has been a good deal discussed and much opposed by many of our best officers, and in fact, I know of but few who are favorably impressed with the idea of a single department of supply. But I still adhere to the views given to the Military Committee in 1869, and I do so not from anything drawn from other services, as much as from the experience of many years in our own

As reference has been made to the changes in the British army in this matter—which I did not know of until I had been before the committee—I will state that since that time I visited Halifax and saw something of the new system adopted in the British service of having all the departments of supply consolidated into a single corps, which they call the "control" department.

It had been said by some of our writers that the new system was a failure, and this failure was pointed to as a warning to us.

I found that, since the consolidation, modifications had been made from time to time; also that their consolidation had gone much further than I had recommended for our service, and further than some of their most distinguished officers had recommended for theirs.

I found, on inquiry, that there was some dissatisfaction with the new department, but when asked how it compared with their former system, the officers said it was an improvement on the old one, and I found their objections were rather as to the details and management of their new system than against the principle of it.

I ought to add that the change in the British system of supplying their army was only adopted after a most exhaustive examination of the subject in all it branches, and from the statements of a large number of the most prominent commanders and officers, of all corps and grades, as to their experience at home and abroad, in the wars of the Crimea, in India, and New Zealand. Still, it is no such thorough consolidation as they have attempted, with more or less success, that I wish to be understood as recommending. And though there are certain general principles which will apply to all armies, I have only been guided by what I have seen at home, in suggesting as I have done, the merging of two of our departments—that of the Quartermaster's and Commissary—into one.

I do not propose, as is done abroad, to include in this consolidation the supply branch of the Medical Department, nor that of the Ordnance Department, for these each require a special knowledge, and to mingle them with the others would not be simplification, but undue accumulation, and of things having no relation to each other.

Why it should require one Department to select medicines, hospital-stores, and surgical instruments, and another to prepare the ammunition, arms, and armament, I can well see; but why we have one Department (the Quartermaster's) to supply coal and another (the Commissary) to supply candles, one to issue clothes, the other to issue food, one to buy grain and another to buy beans, I do not see.

It may be urged that the consolidation suggested would overload a Department now sufficiently burdened; that perfection and excellence are to be had by a subdivision of labor, each having the branch best suited to him, and acquiring skill by being confined to one subject, as is the case in the medical profession and in trade generally. To this it is to be said that in the Army, when you get to the point of consumption, where the supplies leave the hands of the agents of the Government to go into those of the consumer, the work is now, from the necessity of the case, in our service, so far as the two Departments are concerned, mostly done by one and the same officer, the supplies being frequently in the same building and sometimes in the same room.

With these opinions of many of the best officers of the Army favoring this consolidation, not only as a matter of economy but as a measure of efficiency and Army reform, I will not detain the House longer upon this section of the bill.

Sections 11 and 12 are sections regulating the department of supplies.

THE MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Section 13 contains all the provisions of the bill passed by the Senate. It reduces the number of surgeons and assistant surgeons from two hundred and nine to one hundred and sixty-seven. It is recommended by the Surgeon-General of the Army and makes an ultimate annual saving of $61,200.

PAYMASTERS.

Under the present organization we have fifty-five paymasters to pay less than twenty-five thousand troops, or two and a fraction paymasters, with clerks, to pay each one thousand men. These gentlemen generally have comfortable quarters in the large cities, where rents are high, society pleasant, and paymasters nothing to do.

The bill reduces the number of paymasters to thirty-five. And surely no practical business man will need any argument to convince him that thirty-five paymasters, each with a clerk, are enough to pay 25,000 troops. This reduction will result in a total ultimate saving of $58,899.05.

DISABILITY OF OFFICERS.

Section 15 provides for the convening of a board to examine all officers deemed unfit for the proper discharge of their duties from any cause except injuries incurred or disease contracted in the line of their duty, and authorizes the President to muster out any officer so reported by said board after the officer has had an opportunity to show cases against the report.

The section further provides that if the officer's disability is not the result of his own imprudence he shall be mustered out with one year's pay if he shall have served five years and less than ten, two year's pay if he shall have served ten years and less than fifteen, three years' pay if he shall have served fifteen years, and, if he shall have served twenty years, he shall be placed upon the retired list of the Army.

ACTIVE AND RETIRED OFFICERS.

Section 16 authorizes the President to assemble a board of not less than three officers to inquire into the propriety of conduct, capacity, qualifications, and efficiency of any commissioned officer of the Army on the active list, and into the conduct of retired officers who may be reported to the board. If the report of such board is adverse to such officer, after the proceedings have been revised and approved by the President the commission of such officer shall be vacated. The board shall always consist of senior officers, who shall be sworn to an honest and impartial discharge of their duties.

RETIRED OFFICERS.

Section 17 of the bill authorizes the President to cause the retired list of the Army to be examined in order to determine if any retired officers are fit for the duties of an officer on the active list. The names of all such shall be reported to Congress. This section also authorizes the President to send any officer on the retired list who is guilty of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman before a board of investigation as to propriety of conduct. On an adverse report, approved by the President, the commission of the officer shall be vacated.

PROMOTIONS.

Section 18 confines all promotions to the rank of second lieutenant to the graduates of West Point and to the non-commissioned officers of the Army. This will tend to improve the Army and to elevate the standard of the soldier.

If this bill becomes the law, the faithful soldier who carries the gun and knapsack will have some hope of reward for faithful service. His ambition will be encouraged by the hopes of promotion. Educated as he will be under section 19 of this bill, the soldier of our Army will no longer be a slave as now, but a man, hopeful and ambitious, with all the rights, hopes, and prospects of his superior officer. I know there is some criticism of this section, because if it becomes the law citizens can no longer be commissioned by the President. This to my mind is the best feature of the section. If a citizen wants a commission, then let him enlist in the ranks and work his way up. If he will not thus contest for the prize, then let it be given to those who have the pluck and courage to take the chances. They will make the best officers. I believe if this bill becomes the law and it is once known that in the future the commission is to be given to the faithful, competent, and worthy soldier and not to the wayward, reckless, worthless son, whose family and political influence secure it for him, a better class of men will join the Army, and desertion will become the exception in place of the rule as now. Then familiarity between officers and men, in place of destroying discipline and breeding contempt, will cause greater respect, because all, both officers and privates, will be gentlemen.

BREVET RANK.

Section 20 authorizes officers to wear insignia to indicate their brevet rank in the volunteer, as well as in the regular service, as may be directed by the Secretary of War and approved by the President.

It seems but just and right that officers who distinguished themselves in action, and during the war commanded regiments, brigades, divisions, corps, and armies, who held high commission in the volunteer service, were frequently brevetted, and are now reduced to captains, majors, and colonels, should have the right to wear in the service some evidence of the country's acknowledgment of their gallantry.

SERVANTS.

Section 21 authorizes officers to employ soldiers as private servants with their consent and the approval of the commanding officer, provided the officer shall return to the Treasury the amount of the soldier's pay.

This section is recommended by the Secretary of War, the General of the Army, and many Army officers, for the reason that it is impossible for officers to procure servants at many posts on the frontier. This will make a saving of $180,000.

PAY OF SERGEANT-MAJOR, QUARTERMASTER-SERGEANT, AND FIRST SERGEANT.

These non-commissioned officers perform more hard work than any other class of men in the Army, and their pay is the most inadequate.

The sergeant-major and quartermaster-sergeant each receive $23 a month, and the first sergeant $22 a month. The sergeant-major and quartermaster-sergeant's pay is fixed by the bill at $36 a month; the first sergeant's at thirty. These officers must be intelligent, capable men. The discipline and management of the company and regiment depend greatly upon them. If the bill becomes a law, they will be among the first in the line of promotion. Their pay as compared with that of the commissioned officers, and the duties performed by each after this increase, is entirely too small.

As a matter of reform this is one of the best features of the bill, as it will tend to draw to the service a better class of men.

LAUNDRESSES.

Section 23 repeals section 1240 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that women may be allowed to accompany troops as laundresses. This repeal is recommended by many of the best officers of the Army.

General Sherman says:

At posts laundresses are supposed to wash the clothes of soldiers, for which they are paid by the soldiers, but each receives a ration and quarters. In the field they are out of place; and in moving from one post to another they are the cause of expense in transportation. Soldiers can do their own washing; therefore laundresses could be dispensed with, and there would be a saving; but to what extent I can form no estimate.

General Schofield says:

I believe the number of laundresses might be reduced one-half without detriment to the service, and with a corresponding saving of expense. But I could not advise that they be entirely dispensed with.

General Terry says:

I think that laundresses can be dispensed with without injury to the service. I think that not less than $200,000 yearly would be saved by dispensing with them.

General Howard says:

Laundresses had better be dispensed with.

General Reynolds says:

Laundresses should be dispensed with gradually by discontinuing all allowance to them as the present terms of enlistment of their husbands expire. Discontinue all unmarried laundresses at once.

General Pennypacker says:

I am of the opinion that laundresses should be dispensed with, and that soldiers' washing be done by details from companies the same as their cooking is now done. This would make a very considerable saving in expense.

Colonel Crittenden says:

Laundresses, I fear, are a necessary nuisance.

Colonel Dodge says:

Laundresses can and should be dispensed with. Is is an absurd continuation of a custom which grew out of other wants of the men of a company than washing the clothing. No such need is found in the Navy. They are unnecessary and add much to the expense of the Army, particularly in transportation. How much will be saved I am unable to say.

General Vincent says:

At all places where labor to wash can be procured it would not be detrimental to the service to dispense with laundresses. There are now seventeen hundred and forty estimated for as to subsistence and fuel. If one-half be dispensed with the saving will be $85,000 yearly, exclusive of quarters and transportation when commands are moved.

General Marcy, the Inspector-General of the Army, says:

The law of the 16th March, 1802, in regard to laundresses (which is still in force) says: "Women may be allowed to accompany troops as laundresses, in number not exceeding four to a company;" and the Army Regulations authorize one laundress to every nineteen or fraction of nineteen enlisted men. Under the existing organization our Army is allowed upward of thirteen hundred and sixteen laundresses, who are amply compensated for all work they perform by the enlisted men. Besides each one draws a daily ration at an aggregate cost to the Government of over $100,000 per annum. Moreover, quarters and fuel are furnished them, and a large amount of transportation whenever the troops are moved.

It has often been said (and I think with a great deal of truth) that the baggage of four laundresses with their children generally amounts to more than that of all the enlisted men of the company; so that I think I am within the scope of reason in estimating the annual expense to the Government of the thirteen hundred and sixteen Army laundresses at about $200,000. There is no doubt that they are an incumbrance to the troops when changing station. As they and their children cannot be transported with troops serving in the field, they must suffer by being left behind at posts without their husbands where they would not generally be entitled to quarters, fuel, or rations.

In view of the limited appropriations made by Congress for barracks and quarters during the past three years, it has been found impracticable to furnish comfortable or even habitable quarters for laundresses at many posts, and they and their children have suffered in consequence.

In consideration of the facts above stated, it is believed that a material reduction, if not the entire abolition, of laundresses would be a measure of economy, expediency, and humanity.

As it would certainly be a virtual breach of faith to at once discharge those laundresses whose husbands enlisted upon the condition that their wives were to accompany them and receive the allowances of laundresses, I would respectfully recommend that no more married men be allowed to enlist in time of peace, and that, at the expiration of the terms of service of those soldiers whose wives are authorized laundresses, they only be re-enlisted in exceptional cases, such as meritorious non-commissioned officers or especially deserving private soldiers. In this manner a reduction of one-half or the whole number of laundresses could be made without injustice to any one.

In the opinion of many experienced line officers, all the laundresses might with great advantage to the service be dispensed with, and their places supplied by each soldier doing his own washing, or by colored or white men being enlisted and adequately compensated for this especial service, or by details from the troops, which has occasionally been done in our Army and is the universal practice in almost every European service except the English. Our soldiers are regularly detailed to cook for the companies, and in the field they wash their own clothes; so do miners, surveyors, and explorers, and they do not look upon it as any great hardship.

The opinions of these officers show conclusively that laundresses should not be retained. Doing away with them will make a saving annually of $190,000.

TRADERS.

Section 24 provides for the appointment of a trader at every military post by the Secretary of War, on the recommendation of the council of administration, approved by the commanding officer.

In support of this section of the bill, it is sufficient for me to say that so long as traders were appointed, as provided in this section, there was no family management of the sutler business, no selling of tradership, no complaint, no dishonesty, no official bribery. To the credit of the officers of the Army let it be remembered that before traderships could be bought and sold legislation dispensing with the Army council of administration had to be procured. The passage of this section to a law will cure the abuse which has been our national shame.

REFORMS.

Section 25 makes it the duty of the Inspector-General to report annually through the Secretary of War to Congress a synopsis of inspections made during the year, with information concerning the welfare of the service, either as to material or personnel, that may merit notice, for the correction of defects and abuses. The object of this section is to have the Inspector-General bring to the attention of Congress such legislation as in his opinion may be best for the general good of the Army.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY.

Section — fixes the headquarters of the Army in time of peace at Washington. That the capital is the proper headquarters of the Army in time of peace none will deny.

That all orders relative to military operations affecting the military control and discipline of the Army, issued by the President through the Secretary of War, should be promulgated through the General of the Army is a proposition so plain that all sensible men are only surprised that its frequent late arbitrary and wicked violation had not resulted in greater Army demoralization.

The convening of this Congress found the General of the Army living at Saint Louis, almost totally disregarded by the then Secretary of War; the Quartermaster-General, whose iron honesty had saved the Government millions of dollars, ordered against his will to make a European tour.

Army officers are detailed on civil duty in direct violation of law, and so conducting their affairs as to bring shame upon the service and scandal to the Government. An army that had held itself aloof from all political interference found itself used in a most shocking manner for partisan purposes, where a Legislature was driven out at the point of the bayonet, and an officer high in command encouraged to declare martial law in an hour of profound peace. Officers detailed on special duty at the Centennial and elsewhere by order of the Secretary of War, without consultation with their regimental commander, department commanders, or even the knowledge of the General of the Army. Sutlerships and trading-posts for sale to the highest bidder. The officer who dared protest against the extravagant prices charged by the sutler and post-trader, whose profits were made enormous from the necessity they were under of dividing with high Government officials, ordered to the most distant frontier post. Buildings rented in violation of and in the very teeth of the law, and Congress informed in answer to a resolution of inquiry, "It was by my order." A deficiency of $500,000 in the Paymaster's Department, and a demand of an appropriation of that amount to pay the Army for fifteen days of the last fiscal year, while the Book of Estimates asked for $33,697,178.50 to defray the expenses of the military establishment, being $5,366,108.50 more than the appropriations of last year for the same purpose, which amount has since been reduced by the new Secretary of War $5,604,000, showing in itself an utter recklessness in the original estimates of appropriations which could only come from such demoralization as I have shown, and the repetition of which all the provisions of this bill are made to prevent.

The passage of this bill will result in an immediate saving of $387,433.44 annually, and an ultimate annual saving of $1,166,257.76, and will make changes and reforms in the management of the Army which will add greatly to its efficiency. I submit, in conclusion, a statement showing specifically the changes, reductions, and economies of the bill:

The act of July 28, 1866, section 18, allowed two Deputy Paymasters-General, lieutenant-colonels. Vacancies in this grade have existed since January 1, 1872, and March 5, 1873, respectively, the bar placed on promotions in the Pay Department by section 6, act of March 3, 1869, not having been removed by the act of March 3, 1875.

SECTION 18.—SECOND LIEUTENANTS.

No answer needed, as it is estimated that this would save $28,000 annually, aside from fuel and quarters for some time, in consequence of the surplus second lieutenants available for assignment from the discontinued regiments. The new appointments under section 18 from the non-commissioned officers would not commence for at least one year.

The ultimate annual saving of fuel is $55,018 on the basis that the cost for each officer is as follows:

Brigadier-general and colonel	$308 yearly.
Lieutenant-colonel and major	245 yearly.
Captain	231 yearly.
First and second lieutenants	140 yearly.

The ultimate saving of $28,000 under section 18 is independent of fuel, &c., and based on the fact that for some time there will be surplus second lieutenants available for assignment from the discontinued regiments, and that the new appointments under section 18 from the non-commissioned officers will not commence for at least one year.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if any gentleman wishes to discuss this bill I will give way; if not, I will move the previous question, in order that the bill may be put on its passage at once. [After a pause.] I see that no one wishes to discuss the bill, and I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to say a few words.

Mr. BANNING. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] but I desire first that the question shall be taken on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir; I think I can dispose of that motion if I am allowed ten minutes.

Mr. BANNING. I do not wish to cut off debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] has twenty minutes remaining, and yields to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HURLBUT. I suppose that I have a right to the floor in my own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio still holds the floor, as his hour has not expired.

Mr. HURLBUT. Very well. I do not want twenty minutes—probably not ten.

I desire to say to the House that probably there is no question of more delicacy or importance requiring a larger expenditure of careful attention and calm judgment than this proposition for the re-organization of the Army. I have not been able to hear all the remarks of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. BANNING;] but, as I understood them, his statements were exceedingly extravagant; for when he stated, as I understood him, that we had an Army of 16,000 privates and 10,000 officers, he stated what any man who knows anything about the Army Register must recognize as a very gross and extravagant exaggeration. To make out that statement, he has been obliged to add in as officers all non-commissioned officers, sergeants, band-masters, and all the paraphernalia of that kind.

I do not want to go into a question of this magnitude, if I can avoid it, without due consideration. I desire, when the proper time shall come, to offer for this bill a substitute calling for the appointment of a commission to take into consideration the question of the re-organization of the Army, the removal of the undue preponderance of the staff over the line, and generally the reduction of the Army into a proper form of activity, usefulness, and economy. I am encouraged to present this proposition from the very prudent and reasonable course which the House has taken within the last few days in regard to the Navy. And I prefer very much that the House should delegate this power, and that the President should be requested and directed, as proposed in the bill which I shall have the honor to offer as a substitute for this, to appoint a commission of seven officers of the Army, of the most distinguished public service and the largest acquaintance with the various forms and arms of the service, who shall pass upon this question and report to us deliberately by the next session of Congress such modifications and changes as they think ought to be made.

Now, sir, I differ absolutely and in toto from the idea that this country does not require a strong and effective Army. I beg gentlemen to consider that this country, differing from all others, not only has its outward frontier to cover, the shores that look eastward, and to the Canadas and the Gulf, but has also another, our Indian frontier, pressing out constantly with the growth of our population on the one side up to the eastern slopes of the Rocky Mountains, and on the other side pressing back from the Pacific. We have these additional lines to cover. And I stake what little reputation I may have from having studied this subject in saying that this country ought to have to-day a permanent and effective Army, fully officered, and complete in all the adjuncts that are necessary for an Army of not less than thirty thousand men.

I think that the reduction that was made two years ago by stopping the recruiting service down to 25,000 has been a failure. And I hope that the House will not at this stage of the session, with all the work that we have got before us to do, take up a bill of this magnitude, involving such large considerations as are embraced here, to be passed upon in a hurry, as it necessarily must be with the pressure of these appropriation bills leaning upon us, and the hot weather coming on to drive us home; but that this great interest of the Army shall have its fair and full consideration.

Therefore as a test question, to obtain the decision of the House whether this bill shall now be considered, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] has the floor, and did not yield to the gentleman from Illinois for the purpose of making a motion, but for the purpose of discussion.

Mr HURLBUT. Very well; I have the right to make that motion as soon as the gentleman gets through his hour.

Mr. BANNING. Let me inform the gentleman from Illinois that his motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table comes to late. The motion to reconsider has already been agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. No, sir.

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir; I beg the gentleman's pardon; we have already reconsidered the motion. The question is now on the motion to recommit, and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the motion to reconsider has been adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. HURLBUT. Then the pending motion is to recommit. I am willing to recommit. That committee is a good place to which to send back the bill.

Mr. BANNING. We will vote that down.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not think you will.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now, will the House recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 42, noes 81; no quorum voting.

Mr. HURLBUT. I make the point that a quorum has not voted. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and the Chair appointed Mr. HURLBUT and Mr. BANNING.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 43, noes 90.

Mr. KASSON. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ATKINS. If gentlemen will vote, I think it will be found that there is a quorum in the House. The question may be settled without the yeas and nays being ordered.

Mr. HURLBUT. The shortest way to decide the question will be by the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 55.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 16, nays 113, not voting 160; as follows:

Herr Smith, Sparks, Strait, Stevenson, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Thomas, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tucker, Tufts, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Waddell, Wait, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Whiting, Willard, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodburn, and Woodworth—160.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

During the vote,

Mr. BOONE stated that Mr. SCALES was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. WIKE stated that his colleague, Mr. BAGBY, was absent on duty with a subcommittee by order of the House.

Mr. DURAND said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CONGER, who is absent by order of the House. Were he present, I should vote in the negative. I do not know that he would vote at all. I also desire to state that my colleague, Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, who is absent by order of the House, would, if present, vote in the negative.

Mr. FOSTER stated that he was paired with Mr. TUCKER, who, if present, would vote in the negative, while he himself would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. VAN VORHES stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. VANCE, who was absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, stated that he was paired with Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina.

Mr. BRADLEY stated that his colleague, Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS, was absent by leave of the House.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, said: My colleague, Mr. KEHR, is unexpectedly and unavoidably called away. He has left an application with me for a leave of absence. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. JENKS stated that his colleague, Mr. COCHRANE, was absent by order of the House.

Mr. ASHE stated that his colleagues, Mr. WADDELL and Mr. DAVIS, were absent by leave of the House.

Mr. STONE asked, by unanimous consent, that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. HURLBUT objected.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HURLBUT. Still there is no quorum. Now, will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to suggest——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the point of order there is no quorum present?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do. I will only say that I have no desire to block the business of the House or delay this bill a moment. The question is subject to the point of order that it must receive its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole. The second page of the bill, first section, provides for disbanding about two hundred and fifty officers, giving them one year's pay. There is another portion of the bill——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is operating under the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am aware of that, but I am suggesting this to the gentleman on the other side who has charge of the bill, and is conversational rather than otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am aware of that. I desire to state to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that if he will put this bill for hearing in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Wednesday next after the morning hour, he may take it out of committee if he will at five o'clock, as soon as we have had an opportunity of expressing our opinions on it and offering amendments, and pass it, if the majority of the House shall choose to do so. I hope that will be done, so we may have a fair opportunity to consider it.

Mr. BANNING. I have been considering it during the whole winter with my friend from Illinois.

Mr. HURLBUT. You have only considered one side of it.

Mr. BANNING. This is the first suggestion that anybody desired to argue the question. I did not wish to rush the bill through. I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, and said I would yield to any gentleman desiring to debate the question. No gentleman rising, I then asked for a vote. It is a bill retrenching expenditures, and has the approval of Army officers. It is a bill to which I have heard no objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We want to argue the other side; that is what we want.

Mr. BANNING. I offered an opportunity to the gentleman to do so, but he did not then rise.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The gentleman moved the previous question.

Mr. BANNING. Yes; after having given anybody who wanted to an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope the gentleman will agree to my suggestion; it is only fair and right.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HURLBUT. If the gentleman will allow me, I think we can arrange this matter.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move the House adjourn; and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANNING. I hope we will go on with this bill this evening.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 98.

Mr. MACDOUGALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MACDOUGALL and Mr. BANNING were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 41, noes 93.

Mr. HURLBUT. No quorum has yet voted.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REAGAN, on account of illness, was excused from further attendance during this day's session.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 43, nays 140, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Horatio C. Burchard, Caswell, Chittenden, Crounse, Davy, Denison, Dunnell, Eames, Garfield, Gause, Benjamin W. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodburn, and Woodworth—106.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DURAND said: My colleague, Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to say that my colleagues, Mr. EVANS and Mr. ROBINSON, are absent by leave of the House. I am unable to say how they would vote on this question if present.

Mr. BRADLEY. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. WILLARD. My colleague, Mr. CONGER, is absent by leave of the House, serving on an important committee.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce that Mr. WOODBURN is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. MAGOON. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. KIMBALL, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I wish to say that my colleague, Mr. FELTON is absent from his seat, and if present would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to recommit the bill which was pending without the decision of the House when the motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Is not my motion in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was not recognized. A quorum now having appeared, unless a further count is requested on the question of recommittal, the Chair will decide that the motion to recommit does not prevail.

Mr. HURLBUT. I demand a further count if necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will then call the roll of members.

Mr. BANNING. I want to say one word to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] and to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] who seem to think that they have not been treated fairly. I think every gentleman has been treated entirely fairly. When I got through with my argument I yielded the floor to any gentleman who wished to speak for or against the bill, and no one rose to speak either for or against the bill; then my friend from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] rose to speak and I gave him the time he wanted. I had no disposition to cut off any debate. I would much prefer that the bill should be fully debated, and in the hour left I will give half the time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is undoubtedly a good thing to have a bill discussed; but why not give us time to do it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I voted against recommitting the bill because I am in favor of cutting down expenses in every practicable way. I have just been told since I gave that vote that the bill abolished the colored troops. I shall vote for no bill which dismisses the colored troops or which does not equally keep the military service open alike to colored as well as to white citizens.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Is this debate in order? I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. BANNING. I will answer your question in time, but I can only answer one question at a time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If the bill makes a discrimination against the colored and white troops, I shall vote against it.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. If this debate is not in order, I shall object to it.

Mr. BANNING. I am willing to answer any question that the gentleman from New York desires to ask me, but I cannot answer two questions at once. The bill does away with that odious feature in the law which says that the privates of two cavalry regiments and of two infantry regiments shall be colored men, and it leaves the question open as it is in this House and as it is in all the Departments of the Government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It allows colored troops to be enlisted without discrimination.

Mr. BANNING. It leaves it open to all.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The question I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio is this, whether any member of the Committee on Military Affairs knew that he intended to call up this bill this morning?

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman wants to know whether I notified any member of the Committee on Military Affairs that I intended to call up this bill this morning. It was one of the earliest bills that was introduced into the House at this session. It has been considered at three different times in the committee, and the committee authorized me to do just what I have done with it. Last night, in order that every member of the committee should have due notice, I called up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted before we adjourned. I did not go to members of the Committee on Military Affairs or to other members of the House and notify them that the bill was to come up; if I had thought it necessary I would have done so. I regret exceedingly that my friend did not know it was to come up. I will give way to him to say whatever he may wish upon this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. HURLBUT. Permit me a moment, for I desire to get the House out of this difficulty if I can. I would inquire if there is any gentleman on this floor who thinks that a bill of this magnitude ought to be passed in this way, when numbers of gentlemen who have studied the question have amendments which they think are worth proposing? If there are such, I cannot help it. I simply ask in the interest of some of the members who have studied this question that an opportunity be given for offering amendments, and that they be open to fair discussion for as short a time as the House may choose to make it. We would like to have this bill set down for Wednesday next; we think that is a fair proposition, one which should appeal to the good sense and fairness of the House.

Mr. BANNING. I want to answer the gentleman in all fairness. No gentleman up to this time has offered an amendment to this bill. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] after the time has gone by in the House to offer an amendment, says that he has an amendment. If it is proper to state outside of the committee, I will say that he never offered an amendment in committee.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next, if that motion is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division, there were—ayes 36, noes 104.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Before the question is taken I would like to ask my friend from New York [Mr. MACDOUGALL] whether his motion is made for the purpose of adjourning over Decoration Day and allowing the carpets to be taken up in this Hall, or is it a motion made simply for dilatory purposes?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I understand that they want to take up the carpets and clean the Hall on Monday, and Tuesday is Decoration Day.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object to debate.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I want to explain the reason why I make this motion.

Mr. COX. There is no objection on this side.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I object to debate.

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, no debate is in order. The question is upon the motion that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next, and upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 12, nays 178, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Egbert, Benjamin W. Harris, Hunton, Hurd, Hurlbut, Knott, Lane, MacDougall, Nash, Smalls, and Andrew Williams—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Ward, Warren, White, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willard, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, James Wilson, Fernando Wood, Yeates, and Young—178.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William H. Baker, Banning, Bass, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Burleigh, Cason, Caulfield, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Conger, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Davy, Douglas, Evans, Faulkner, Felton, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Gibson, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Hoar, Hoge, Holman, Hooker, Hyman, Joyce, Kehr, Ketchum, Kimball, King, George M. Landers, Lapham, Levy, Edmund W. M. Mackey, L. A. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Woodburn, and Woodworth—99.

So the motion was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. CUTLER. My colleague, Mr. MILES ROSS, has been called away by important business.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleagues, Mr. EVANS and Mr. ROBINSON, are absent by leave of the House. I am unable to say how they would vote if they were present.

Mr. FOSTER. On this vote I am paired, as I was on the last vote, with Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, who if present would vote "no."

Mr. FORT. My colleague, Mr. STEVENSON, has been absent at all the roll-calls to-day; he is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move that the House now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being upon a division—ayes 45, noes 100; one-fifth voting in the affirmative

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 48, nays 135, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Horatio C. Burchard, Cannon, Caswell, Crounse, Davy, Denison, Dobbins, Eames, Hancock, Haralson, Benjamin W.
